This eliminates one of the places which the men with a desire to serve have found worth-while. It does not, however, take into consideration the small army who have thrown themselves into work of a semi-social character where their technical college training can be put to immediate and effective use.

It takes a harsh judge to condemn the young men of this country for their failure to embrace the ministry, because they have so recently shown themselves ready to enter wholeheartedly into any service, at the risk of death, to advance the nation's welfare and the help in the salvation of the world. Many forces set in motion co-operatively are needed now to meet the situation—one of the most critical in the history of the country.

The ministers themselves should be the first to make their profession attractive, as no inducement is stronger than that of a powerful example. The laity and parents will follow and then the young men—who has ever known them to fail in a real crisis?

Your Own Epitaph

IF YOU had to write your own epitaph, and the tombstone were big enough, could you truthfully put all this on it:

1. Here lies the body of one whose daily life was a sermon, and whose conversation left no bitterness.
2. This was a soul that had many faults, but he was always trying to correct them.
3. His friends outnumbered his enemies, and all his enemies were caused by his honest convictions.
4. Little children came to him without asking, and old people asked him to come again.
5. He lost money, but never lost his faith; and having once found the pearl of great price, he never sold it for something more showy.
6. He shared generously of everything except his troubles, and smiled just before he turned a corner.
7. The men who worked for him cried when he died, and those he worked for, closed up the office, and walked the team back from the grave.
8. He was kind without being condescending, and poor people never thought of his income.
9. He knew how to pray, and loved religion, and was not afraid nor ashamed to talk about God to the boy in the office elevator.
10. People loved to see him coming along the street, and when he was absent from church, they knew he was sick, or out of town.
11. Those in need were not afraid to borrow money of him, and the rich often sent him money to give to others.
12. He enjoyed life so much, and lived it so well, that no one thinks of him as dead, and he lives in very many other people who imitate his virtues and follow his example.

become more worldly minded, has found that those who kept their faith and returned disillusioned have come back finer than ever.

Dr. Ralph B. Pomeroy, professor of Ecclesiastical Polity and Canon Law at the General Theological Seminary, is positive that the quality of the men there has been considerably improved this year.

"The war has had precisely the same effect upon theological seminaries as upon many other branches of work," Dr. Pomeroy said. "It made the best men far finer and left the poor ones weaker. Those who learned self-discipline through general discipline are better than before, while those who failed to learn it slumped when discipline was removed.

The Children

By CLARENCE E. FLYNN

WHEN two gray-haired old parents meet
In quiet home or busy street,
The talk will run in formal style
On formal things a little while.
Then, following a silent spell:
"The children, are they doing well?"

Then faded eyes grow quickly bright.
Worn features take a sudden light,
As they recount with pride and joy
The story of each girl and boy.
How these old parents love to tell
That every child is doing well!

The great All-Father up above,
I often think, in words of love
Recounts each victory and success,
Joys in His children's happiness.
I think He, too, delights to tell
That all His own are doing well.

Why a Korean Church Split in Two

It Might Have Been Due to a Fight, but It Wasn't

By REV. W. B. NORTON, Ph. D.

THE deacons and elders had a fight. Somebody felt miffed and because of it Mrs. Dong and Mrs. Cynn wouldn't speak to each other; the rest of the congregation took sides and the quarrel spread in extent and in intensity until the Christians of the church couldn't stay and worship in the same building, and so they divided.

As you read the title of this article perhaps the above were some of the surmises which arose in your mind. Church splits sometimes occur that way. But I have a different story to tell about Syen Chun, a Presbyterian stronghold in Korea, so alive that while all the members of the two churches of the village are Presbyterians, some of them don't even know it and call themselves just Christians.

My introduction to Syen Chun was on a certain Wednesday evening when on the arrival of the train my wife and I were taken directly to the regular weekly prayer meetings which were already in progress at the two churches. At both places we found great congregations, from 800 to 1000 being present at each church.

At one of the churches I inquired who was leading the prayer meeting.

"He is one of our elders," said my informant.

"Oh, he is in jail. He was one of the signers of the Korean declaration of independence," came the answer.

Notwithstanding the absence of the pastor and the reason why he was absent the prayer meeting was of the jubilant type. The singing was enthusiastic even though of the somewhat see-saw variety. The prayers were spontaneous, fervent and came without urging by the leader. It was in fact the kind of prayer meeting the strongest churches in America might well be glad to see.

I made a briefer stay at the other prayer meeting, but the same spirit seemed to be prevailing in both churches.

WHY the original church split was apparent without any explanation, and I was ready to believe the story that was told me that the first church building became too small to hold the people and so the congregation divided and erected the second building in another part of the town. The parish boundaries are clearly held to and attendance at the two churches is not regulated by personal preference for one pastor or the other, or by the choice in the social status of the first families in one church as compared with those in the other church, but purely by the question of family residence. If a member is tired of one pastor or congregation the way for him to change is to move his domicile to the other side of town and no questions are asked. He automatically goes to the other church.

As an illustration of the lack of sectarianism in Syen Chun, one of the residents was brought into court in connection with the revolution.

"What church do you belong to?" was asked him.

"I am a Christian, I belong to the church in Syen Chun," he replied.

"But every Christian belongs to some denomination. What denomination do you belong to?" the magistrate again urged.

"I don't know what denomination the church is, but I am a Christian and belong to the church in Syen Chun."

It is not to be implied that the church in Syen Chun is derelict in teaching the fundamentals of Presbyterianism as handed down by the fathers, or that church membership is a matter of indifference ecclesiastically, but I do mention that one of the fruits of the comity of the churches in Korea, dividing up the territory in such a way as to banish denominational rivalry, is the absence of sectarian emphasis and the laying of the entire stress on things essentially Christian. As there are only Presbyterian Christians in Syen Chun and the church membership scarcely knows there are such folks as Baptists, Congregationalists or Methodists, not to mention the several varieties in each of the several denominations, why burden their minds or hearts with discussing the differences. These are some of the points made by Dr. G. S. McCune, whose true-blue

A Korean youth who is learning better farming at the Syen Chun mission's model farm

Presbyterianism cannot be questioned, as he showed us about the mission.

A STORY about praying for deliverance from rain and for the coming of rain in connection with the building of the two churches, called respectively the North and South Churches, is of interest. When the first church was built the Christians prayed it might not rain until the roof was on, and the prayer was answered. When the second church was in course of erection the country needed rain very much. Some of the non-Christians said: "These Christians will pray for dry weather until the roof of the church is on, and it won't rain, so we had better turn in and help and get the roof on as quickly as possible." The story is that they did as they promised and the rain was withheld until the roof was on, and then it rained. Whether a mere coincidence or a direct answer to prayer, the facts are as recited.

A remarkable feature of the two large churches is that the village of Syen Chun has less than 6,000 population. It would seem that a very large percentage of the people are members of the church or at least attend its services.

One of the remarkable men living in Syen Chun is an old man who was a royal embroiderer in the days when the Korean government was in power. He teaches embroidery to a class of young women, some of them widows. In order to bring to the attention of the American government the extent and reality of the atrocities committed by the Japanese in killing people and in burning churches he made a map of Korea and embroidered in silk the places where massacres and church burnings had taken place. The map was sent to President Woodrow Wilson.

The mission at Syen Chun has 200 acres of land and all but 40 acres are utilized in a model farm on which the boys not only are learning improved methods of farming but are obtaining their education through self-help.

It is conceded that of all occupations nothing is more difficult to learn from mere text-books than agriculture, and so we can appreciate the statement of Dr. McCune: "You can talk to the Koreans about the need of better farming till you are gray-headed and they will not change one iota, but if you show them by actual demonstrations how better farming produces larger and better-paying crops, they will learn the lesson." Perhaps this is true everywhere but it is especially true in Oriental countries where century-long customs have been followed and where there is no background for illustrating methods by appeals to other lines of endeavor where improvements have been made by similar instruction. On the Syen Chun farm and in the workshops we saw Korean boys engaged in blacksmithing, furniture-making, brick-making, in caring for cows, pigs, and grain which was ready for winnowing.

THE evening we left Syen Chun over 40 of the boys who had just come out of jail where they had been confined two weeks—as the Japanese admitted, not because there was any charge against them but because they were safer in jail than on the outside—gave us a serenade and a rousing farewell. One of their number stepped forward and delivered a personal address of good wishes. Then their yell leader called for the college yell. It was given with commendable zest but it didn't satisfy the leader. "Put a little more pep into it, boys," he shouted. "Now lift it, everyone." No American college cheer leader ever put more punch into his doubled-up fists, swaying body and facial contortions than did this young Korean as he led his fellows in a rousing series of 'rahs. If it had not been so dangerous I am sure they would have all shouted "Manzei, Long Live Korea," for you could see and hear the very tingle of independence and patriotism in their enthusiasm, but they kept within the bounds of the law.

It is well to remember that all this optimism, earnestness in religion and industry in school training is in a land where exists injustice, persecution and repressive measures of the most galling character.

A Five-Part Story for the Young Folks

By C. H. LERRIGO

Illustrated by William C. McNulty

But I had work myself to start the next morning—picking up and sacking potatoes on Mr. Naylor's farm.

Instalment Four

CHAPTER VII

MAJOR BASSEL had a fire in the big grate, and everything looked very cozy and cheerful in Justamere Cabin. The Major looked with cordial recognition at our companion.

"Why, it's Harold Persmann!" he exclaimed.

"Yes, father. It's Harold Persmann," said Kent, "and I have a long story to tell you that is partly about him and partly about us and partly about those missing securities."

Then Kent began, and Kate helped, and Harold explained certain things, and I added a word now and then, and after a while we had the story all told.

"So you think the missing valuables are now at the bottom of the lake?"

"That's our opinion," said Kent.

"And none of you fine divers could drag up an object as large as a satchel in ten feet of calm water?"

"Well, we didn't," admitted Kent. "He's going to bring a professional tomorrow."

"You could have got it, dad, in those days before the war," said Kate. "I remember how you used to dive. Nobody could dive like you. And you used to stay under so long that I nearly would burst, because I held my breath every second that you were under."

"But I wasn't a professional," laughed the Major.

"He'll get no professionals that could have equaled you in those days," insisted Kate.

"I think I know why Kent and the two young men who dived had no better luck," said I. "It was because they made no allowance for the fact that the boat had drifted."

"How did you know it had drifted?" asked Kent.

"I had my eye on it when it went under. It was in a direct line between our dock and the south electric light on the island, and perhaps ten canoe lengths from the island. When you were diving I looked at my landmarks and concluded that you were at least twenty feet out."

"Why didn't you say so?"

"Nobody asked me. And then I'm not sure that I wanted those men to earn that dollar. You can try all by yourself in the morning, Kent."

"I surely will," said Kent. "Why it is the most important thing in all the world to father, isn't it, dad?"

THE Major smiled meditatively. "Well, it is important," said he, "but let's not exaggerate it. I think you children have conceived the idea that I can't get on my feet physically or any other way until this trouble of the missing package is cleared away from me. That isn't all true. When my Y. M. C. A. friend got me started toward getting well he gave me a prescription that is even strong enough to overcome a handicap as severe as that. The loss does make a difference, of course. For one thing I am over $23,000 out of pocket unless that package is found, and that not only takes all I have, but leaves me in debt. Another thing is that my record will never be quite beyond attack while that unexplained mistake lingers. My friends will believe in me, but it leaves a grand point of attack for any enemies that I might make. So I want it cleared up. But don't get the idea that I can't rise in spite of it. For I can and will. I am getting stronger and more ready to take up my responsibilities every day."

"If Persmann or anyone else recovers that satchel, we'll make 'em show what's in it," I said, savagely; for it hurt me to think that this fine man should suffer so unjustly.

"I'm not so sure that we can," said the Major. "You youngsters have been quite high-handed in your measures. I can't approve at all of the things you have done, such as searching Mr. Persmann's cottage. Your plan for upsetting the canoe was very wrong. Even if you were quite sure that the satchel held the missing bonds, you would not be justified legally in such actions, and you scarcely seem to have any real reason for fastening suspicion on to Mr. Persmann or supposing that, had he taken the package, he would be so unwise as to carry it around with him in such a rash manner."

"Why, I don't think that would be rash, father. It seems to me it would be natural. Just like if I had a lot of money I would carry it in my inside vest pocket. This package was too bulky for that, but he kept it as near to himself as he could."

"Now, please don't go and throw cold water on our theories, daddie," begged Kate.

"I scarcely need do that," laughed the Major. "They seem to have the entire lake over them at this moment. But I just want to warn you not to entertain false ideas that won't stand the cold light of reason. Now I want all of you to go to bed, and mother will see that this Harold boy gets a good, comfortable bed for one night at least."

BUT after they were all gone I stole back into the living-room where the Major still sat before the open fire.

"Major," I said, "when you spoke about that prescription the Y. M. C. A. man had given you, and how much it was doing for you, I thought I would ask you to tell me more about it. You know you said that you and I were a lot alike, and some day when I was ready for it you were going to tell me the secret of it."

"And you think you are ready now?"

"I don't know, Major. I sleep all right every night now, and I've got over being afraid of dogs, and I don't hide when the lightning comes, and I can make a trip in the dark without seeing so many things, but I have to fight that Mr. Personality awfully hard to keep from running away."

"The Y. M. C. A. man's secret is one of the very best ways to help when a fellow gets to the fighting stage," said the Major. "He didn't tell me the secret the first day, nor the second day. I think he wanted me to get to the place where I had tried to put up my own fight for quite a while and could see how much I needed help. Just like you see now that you need help."

"I surely do, Major," I said.

"Well, one day, after I'd had a bad spell and was feeling mighty miserable and ashamed, because I had been rather proud of how I was winning out, and supposed I never would go down again, I said to him:

'I'm ashamed to the very soul to have needed you again. I don't know how you can help me so much, nor why you do it for me, nor how I happen to be so supremely fortunate as to have you here to help.'

"It's all answered in one, Major," he said. 'How do I help you? Why do I help you? Why am I here to help you? I came into the service for that particular reason, Major. Of course I didn't come into the army to help Major Bassel, because I didn't know there was such a man. But I came in because a Friend of yours who is also a Friend of mine and means more to me than all else in the world, said, 'Wilson, there'll be lots of poor fellows needing help in that big army. I want you to be one of the men who will go to them and give them my love and strength.'

"I know, Wilson," I said, 'I guess I've asked as if I had forgotten Him, but you mean the Lord Jesus.'

"Yes, He's the Friend I mean, Major," said Wilson. 'But I don't want you to speak of Him in that casual way, Major. He isn't a casual kind of a friend. He's something special or you are missing Him altogether. There's a force that flows from Him through me to you and to every man needing help. It is enough of a power to turn the balance when a man is almost down. It is spoken of in the New Testament as rivers of living water that shall flow from the man who believes. Some of that living water goes out from me to you and buoys you up.'

"It's fine to hear you, Wilson," I said. 'I hate to think that you'll be gone in a few days. I don't know what I'll do without you.'

"And then he gave me his secret recipe."

"Why, you won't need me at all," he said. 'You'll have HIM. You won't need to look up at this face of mine that has nothing more than the fresh scars of mustard gas. You can look into His face. You won't need to feel the grip of my hands. You can grip His. You are going to be one of those who know Him for yourself and the chances are that He'll be using you, and that forth from you shall flow rivers of living water.'

"Well, that was his secret, Jerry. I've been trying to tell you something about it in the readings that we've had together in the mornings. And I knew that some day soon you would want the whole story. You see the great thing about the Lord Jesus is that He doesn't deal with any superficial personality. He takes right hold of the inner man, the one who works the shellshock on the soldier, and the nerve wreck on the civilian. That's why I don't have to depend on my hopeful young people setting to work with such vigor and clearing up all my difficulties. I can get well and strong anyway, because after all, if it is all right with Him, the rest doesn't matter so very much. And it will make you bolder and more confident, less timorous and more steady when you learn that He is the King."

WELL, I didn't say anything. Collie was waiting for me to go to bed. He always crept under my cot the minute I was safely in. After I lay down that night he came and shoved his nose into my face as much as to say that he understood all about it and was very glad. I was asleep in a minute, and just a few minutes later there was Kent pulling and hauling at the bedclothes, and it was morning.

"Hurry up," urged Kent. "It's daylight, and I want to make a try for that satchel before Persmann or anyone else gets around."

I slipped into my bathing-suit and we went down to the dock.

"I believe Persmann came back last night and borrowed our canoe," said Kent. "I'm sure I didn't leave it this side of the dock. I'll bet he got uneasy in the night and came out to try some scheme. But I'll bet he didn't get the satchel."

But neither did we. We paddled out in the canoe and found the oars of the boat. Then we rowed out to a spot that seemed exactly in line with my landmark. Kent dived repeatedly and I myself made a few awkward attempts, but we failed to do anything more than stir the mud and scare the fish. In an hour Kent decided to quit.

"But I'm coming back to try again later on," he announced. "That thing is bound to be there, and I'm bound to get it. I'm going to get it for dad's sake."

CHAPTER VIII

I SHAN'T take any steps to send Harold back to Mr. Persmann," Major Bassel announced. "Mr. Persmann may or may not be his legal guardian, but I believe Harold's story and I feel that the man has forfeited any moral right that he might once have possessed. On the other hand, I sha'n't give Harold money to go away, one reason being that I haven't any to spare."

But that very morning there came a registered letter for me from my father.

I opened it and found a hundred dollars in ten dollar bills. Right away I decided that I'd give Harold half of it. Then I reflected that he would need more than that if he were going to get his sister away from the place where she was nothing much more than a slave. So I thought maybe I'd give him seventy. But I had a feeling that seventy wasn't enough and eighty would be none too much, and so at last I went to the Major to ask him about it.

"Do you care what I do with that money?" I asked.

"Your father sent it for you to use," said he, "but I reckon he expects me to keep one eye open about anything that you do. How do you want to squander it? Spend it on gum?"

He asked this as solemn as a judge, but of course I could see the joke.

"No, sir, I want to give it away," I said.

"How much of it?" he asked.

"One hundred dollars," said I.

"Every penny of it?" he asked.

"Yes, sir, every penny," I replied.

The Major put his hands on my shoulder and looked me square in the face until he had me all blushing.

"Boy," he said, "I'm proud of you. You're a son of your father, you are. Don't tell me another word. Go and do it. After all, what do we want of money, living here at this place? You've got along without money for nearly two months, haven't you?"

"Yes, sir, and I can get along a while longer if I have to."

I WENT off to find Harold and turn ten good ten-dollar bills over to him, but I didn't propose to be without money, either. Mr. Naylor has a farm right across from the club-house. Kent and I had done several jobs for him and this week he was plowing his potatoes and offered us thirty cents an hour each for picking them up and sacking them. Two months ago it would have killed me to do it, but I didn't mind telling anybody now that I was getting as strong as any farmer boy who ever lived in the country.

Harold didn't make so very much fuss about taking that money.

"I need it awfully bad, and that's a fact," he said. "I'm going to be able to pay you back some day. And if you never do another good thing in your life, you've done one that can't fade away. I'll be away from here in half an hour."

What Has Gone Before

JERRY KING, who tells the story, goes to spend the summer with Major Bassel's family at Justamere Cabin, where his father hopes the motherless boy will become strong and healthy. Major Bassel is recovering from severe wounds and several months in a German prison camp, but his progress is retarded by worry over the disappearance of securities worth $23,000 which were in his custody before he entered the army. He had made good the loss by giving up all his property, but is unable to remember what he did with the package. The suspicions of Jerry and of Kent and Kate Bassel, the Major's children, are turned toward George Persmann, an employee of the trust company in which the Major had worked, and they determine to watch him closely after discovering Harold Persmann, a nephew, in his home disguised as a girl. They find a refuge for the boy and supply him with boy's clothes and he tells them of a small bag which Persmann carries with him all the time. This bag, which they think contains the securities, sinks to the bottom of the lake when Persmann's boat overturns while he is fishing, and amateur efforts to bring it up by diving fail.

And he was, for he left on the next Interurban. Kent went with him as far as the city to see that he got safely started. There was no danger of Persmann's seeing him, for Persmann was not leaving the lake that day. He had telephoned for a diver and he proposed to watch that lake every minute until the diver came and fished out his satchel.

About eleven o'clock a big heavy-set fellow came, a man who had been a life-guard at one of the city beaches. "Where's your outfit?" asked Persmann.

"It's in this bag," said the man, pointing to a little bag he carried in his hand.

"But your diver's outfit," said Persmann.

"What d'ye mean?" asked the man. "My diver's outfit is a bathing-suit and a towel. What more would ye want for diving in a pond like this?"

I suppose Persmann had expected him to bring a regular diver's apparatus so that he could go under and walk around all over the bottom of the lake, but he had to be content with what the man brought.

The old boat came into service again. Persmann actually came to me and asked if he might "borrow" it. I had put some fresh solder over the leaks and fished the oars out of the lake already, so it was in pretty fair shape.

I told Persmann I would "lend" it to him, and all the time I was trying hard not to laugh because Kate was spouting into my ear, in a whisper, some of her nonsense.

THE diver didn't seem very particular as to where he worked. I learned afterwards that Persmann had engaged him by the hour at ten dollars an hour or fraction thereof. Divers, it seems, are high-priced. Persmann tried to locate the place as well as he remembered, but he had been too busy and too much excited that night to locate it by any fixed landmarks, and I saw at once that his recollection was just about a hundred feet off.

"I'll go around in a gradually narrowing circle," said the diver. "Then I'll be sure to hit it."

But, although he described a pretty liberal circle, its outer edge was only just inside of the actual spot. He would earn a good many hours pay before he struck the satchel, at that rate.

I was not in the boat. The Major, with his awakened cheerfulness had expressed enough interest to want to go out in the canoe with me.

I said to him, "He's away off in his location."

"Why not show him?" said the Major.

This was a surprise to me, for I really had conceived the idea that for some reason the Major's cheerful spirits were due to the loss of the satchel and that he would prefer that it remain lost.

However it made no difference. Mr. Persmann was so sure that he was right that he would listen to no suggestions from a mere boy, and so far as the diver was concerned it was evident that he was willing to cover the whole lake in his diving if need be.

After we had watched for about half an hour the Major grew tired of it.

"It's getting monotonous," said he. "We might as well fish while we wait. Let's go back and get the fishing tackle."

This was the first time he had shown any interest in fishing since we had been at the lake. And it wasn't from ignorance of the art, either. Major Bassel soon showed me that he knew what fishing was. By one o'clock we had a nice mess of fish, some of them weighing as much as three pounds.

"I think I'd like a fish dinner," said the Major. "Let's clean up these fellows and get mother to give us a good fry of fish. I guess that professional diver can follow his profession with about as much success if we don't watch him as if we do."

And that was about the way of it. We had just the best dinner you ever ate. It was about three o'clock

How Does Your Garden Grow?

IT WAS a very warm day; so warm that the rest of us were quite content to sit quietly upon the broad, shady veranda, and talk. We had no desire to exert ourselves unduly, no impulse to undertake any task that was not absolutely necessary. Palm-leaf fans made the only breeze and, despite frequent hopeful glances, the placid blue sky held no hint of a welcome storm.

"It's just a-blistering," said the grandmother-lady, in a small discouraged voice. "It seems to me that it's never been so hot—and for such a long time—before!"

We all agreed with her, a trifle listlessly. Only the grandfather-man did not agree. In fact he seemed almost anxious to get away from the veranda; he seemed strangely restless and eager.

"I don't think that the heat is so frightful," he said slowly, "in fact I think that I'll go out and take a turn in the garden!"

The grandmother-lady dropped her fan with a little, almost impatient, exclamation.

"That means," she said, and there was the finality of one-who-knows in her voice, "that means that you want to go out, in this broiling sun, and pull weeds! It means that you're not contented to sit in the shade and do nothing. It means that you must want to get a sunstroke!"

The grandfather-man smiled his gentle, curiously disarming smile.

"Yes," he said, "it means just that. I do want to go into my garden and pull weeds. My onion bed will be getting quite beyond me, if I don't!"

Some one of us spoke, suddenly. I don't remember which one.

"But," that some one said, "why do you bother with weeds so late in the season? The garden's almost finished, now. Why not let the weeds grow up, if they want to. They won't be able to do very much harm!"

I think that I will never forget the way that the grandfather-man drew himself up. It was almost as if he were standing at attention.

"Weeds in a garden always do harm," he said. "If they do nothing else, they make the garden seem careless and untidy. I think that a garden should look just as well, when the frost comes, as it looks in the springtime. I think that a man should take pride in the way that his garden grows. I don't think that the little inconveniences—like heat—should make him forget his plans and his purposes."

The grandmother-lady was smiling, a small tender little smile.

Is It as Free of Weeds Now as It Was in Life's Springtime?

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

"That's you!" she said. "That's you! Well, if you feel that way, I suppose there's no keeping you here in the shade!" And—

"You're quite right," the grandfather-man answered, as he walked away in the direction of his onion patch. "You're quite right!"

KEEPING a garden neat and tidy—whether it's a vegetable garden, or a flower garden, or a mind garden, or a life garden—is not always the easiest thing in the world to do. It's sometimes hard for the average person to go out in the sun and weed a plot of ground; it's often so much simpler to sit in the shade and wave a palm-leaf fan, and talk about the weather. It's very easy to say:

"I gave my garden a good start in the springtime—I tended it with care, and watered it, and hoed it. If the weeds come now it isn't really my fault—I did all that was required of me when I gave it the start. Weeds will come and, when the garden is growing old, they don't matter much!"

It's very easy to talk that way. It's very easy to convince oneself with suave arguments. But there's something not very sound in such arguments even though there is something convincing about them! There's seldom anything very permanent in arguments that are too smooth and easy to give!

JOHN CROWELL made friends easily. Everybody who did business with him admitted that. He had such a winning personality, such a cheery, hail-fellow-well-met, way with him. Folk—when they first knew him—could not say enough in praise of his methods, his prospects, his clean, boyish good looks.

John Crowell was a salesman. His work took him through a large prosperous area, crowded with prominent business men who were good buyers. It was not strange that his personality, coupled with the people that he met, should bring in many orders—it was only natural that his little black record book should be crowded with words that meant very real money.

Yes, when people first met John Crowell, they were very pleasantly impressed with him. They gave him the names of their friends, they gave him valuable business hints. And, best of all, they gave him their confidence. But that was when they first knew him.

For, months after their first meeting with him, people were prone to admit that John Crowell did not wear well. He took their orders, he made promises, he accepted their hints, and then he went away—still jovial and charming. But when the goods that had been ordered made an appearance they were often faulty, and not according to contract. And when wrathful business men communicated with John Crowell in regard to the faultiness, they received pleasantly non-committal answers and promises—but no service. And it was the same after they had made their second protest, and their third, and their fourth. It was always the same. The faulty goods had come to stay, and John Crowell was too busy going out after new business to take care of the old business.

"He thinks," one man who had been a victim of John Crowell's charm said to me, "He thinks that his responsibility ends when he started something. He thinks that he can be nice and pleasant and sell us on promises; and then get away with goods that don't come up to specifications! But—" the man's fist banged down, hard, upon his desk—"but just wait until he comes around for another order! I'll show him just how far a good start—and nothing else—can carry him. And I know a couple of other chaps that will be glad to show him the same thing!"

JOHN CROWELL was the wrong sort of a gardener. He was the sort of a gardener who gave his garden a fair start—who did an adequate amount of watering and hoeing and weeding in the springtime—when the garden was so new that it had borne neither flowers nor fruit. And he was the sort of a gardener who was content to sit back, in the shade, after the garden had produced and let it take care of itself. That was why the weeds of discontent grew so rapidly and spread with such speed among his customers.

Don't be John Crowell's sort of a gardener. Be the sort of a gardener that the grandfather-man is. Take as much pride in the completion of your work and play and achievement—whether it be an onion patch, or a stroke of business, or something fine in the way of mental or moral development—as you do in the starting of it. For weeds can never come to a garden in a harmless way—if they do nothing else they make the garden seem untidy and careless. And a garden, if it's the sort of a garden that a real workman can take pride in, should look as well—and should be as well—as it looks, and is, in the springtime!

What the Church Can Do

IT is time for the leaders of the Church to do some clear thinking. It can not be that, with the peace of the world hanging in the balance, the great denominations can afford to be silent and inactive. Never was there such an opportunity as now for the Christian Church in America—and that means every denomination—to throw the weight of its influence and its utterance on the scale, and let the world see where it stands on this greatest question of all time. So pregnant is the situation with big possibilities dependent upon the failure or success of the great efforts now being put forth for world peace, that we find conflicting convictions even among the best observers.

Will Irwin in his latest book, "The Next War," foreshadows a world-wrecking conflict. Dr. Harry Emerson Fosdick, in a notable pulpit address, boldly declares that the hour has come when the Christian Church must either give up war or else give up civilization. He reminds us that "the Church, all too feebly recognizing the irreconcilable conflict between war and the spirit of Jesus," has nevertheless been striving to restrain war, to limit its area, abolish its barbarities and "to bring where it could the truce of God."

The plain fact, which writers and speakers have come suddenly to recognize, is that war has been rudely stripped of its traditional glory. It has become wholly and unqualifiedly revolting. And the next war, should it come, we are warned in advance, will be an unspeakable horror. Modern science has ways of exterminating life in masses, the very mention of which makes men shudder. Besides, to finance the next war—which let us trust may never come—will hopelessly bankrupt all the nations, and civilization would cease to exist.

Do our ministers like the picture? Can any Church claiming to be Christian, reconcile Christianity and war any more?

The question which Dr. Fosdick suggests is one that should find a ready answer from every pulpit in America. The old order militant is past; let our churches act promptly and vigorously in ushering it out, and the best way of doing this is for the churches, one and all, of every denomination, to endorse heartily the movement for international peace and reduction of armaments. The united voice of the Churches of America will aid materially in forwarding the great work in which this nation has taken the leading step.

There can be no abiding peace unless we first seek the divine approval. The Church must lead in this emergency by admonition from the pulpit and formal resolution by the pews, for the people, too, must have a voice. The result will be a demonstration of strength of the Christian faith of our churches. It would win to them the support of the millions of toilers who, in the last analysis, are the worst sufferers by war.

Our churches may never have, in a whole generation, so favorable an opportunity for high Christian service as that which now lies open.

War Cost

OLD Man Ultimate Consumer, the Taxpayer, the Business Man, the Old-Timer, the Young-Man-Around-Town, the Editor, the Average Citizen and the Minister were talking about the cost of living, and, like Mark Twain's remark about the weather, there was a good deal of talk about it but nothing ever done. Finally the Taxpayer spoke up:

"I don't want to seem to be repeating myself, but I can't help wondering how long it will take to get down or up to a reasonable basis of living as long as the world conditions remain like this. May I read a statement I cut out of the morning paper?" The rest of the company nodded wearily, and Taxpayer read:

(Associated Press.)

"Washington, July 14.—More than ten billion dollars a year now is being spent for war purposes by nations invited to the disarmament conference called by President Harding. It was shown today in official budget statements filed with the federal revenue board here.

"England, France, Italy, the United States and Japan now are spending each year for past wars and preparation for future wars more money than is disbursed for any other single purpose.

"England's war charge is approximately 60 per cent of her total revenues, while France is plunging at the rate of 90 per cent; 75 cents out of each dollar collected by the United States government goes for the maintenance of the army, navy, interest on the war debt, and to support railroads and ships under obligations acquired as a result of the great war. Italy is spending approximately 50 per cent for war purposes and Japan more than 60 per cent."

"This means TEN BILLIONS A YEAR for the chief Powers of the world. And we wonder at the troubles of living! At the Industrial unrest, and the small salaries paid school teachers and ministers, and the unemployment and the embarrassments of the railroads and the housing problem. And all the rest. But TEN BILLIONS paid out on NON-PRODUCTIVE business like WAR, looks like a tidy sum to me."

"You're a taxpayer. You are helping pay your share of the TEN BILLION," said the Minister. "Why do you keep paying it?"

"I wonder why," said Taxpayer. "Yes, we all wonder why?" said the chorus of the Ultimate Consumer, the Business Man, the Old-Timer, the Young-Man-Around-Town, the Editor, the Average Citizen, the Minister, and the Taxpayer, who added, as a mournful refrain, "I wonder why!"

Reforming the Masses

THERE is no such thing. And yet we keep talking and writing about reforming "society." Society is never reformed in the mass. Governments are never reconstructed wholesale. Business is never redeemed by a mass movement.

There are no mass movements in the history of progress. All human progress has come about by industrial conversion to truth. And it may as well be accepted as a well-established fact that the Christian method which wins by personal addition to the program of Life is the only method which pays.

It is a waste of time and energy for the preacher to address his message to the masses. It will never reach them. Consider the Master's plan and study his way.

"And seeing the multitudes (or masses), he went up into a mountain. And when he was seated, his disciples came to him. And he taught them."

The fact that Jesus spent his teaching time with a very few men reveals His wisdom and His knowledge of the right way. One Peter truly converted, one John truly consecrated, one Paul set on fire to say, "Woe is me if I preach not the Gospel," are worth working for.

The history of the world is written around personalities and made by individuals. The fact of Luther and Wycliff and Huss and John Knox and Cromwell, and Washington and Lincoln and Roosevelt, is a greater fact than what is called "class consciousness." We are talking much nowadays of "social" reform and "community" spirit and "co-operative" measures. But none of them is possible unless some individual spirit dwells in the mass like leaven to leaven the lump.

When God in the fulness of time was ready to make Himself known to the world, He did not send an army of angels into the world. He sent one Person, Jesus Christ. That one personality was enough. An army of angels would have defeated the Divine purpose.

There is too much diffusive preaching, directed at "things in general." Make it particular, Brother. Aim at one person and get him. You can't bring down the masses with your sermon or newspaper reform article. But you may hit one man if you aim straight at him.

George Washington's Prayer

THE following prayer by the first President of this Republic has today a historic interest and a singular appropriateness in view of present conditions. It was sent by the President's order to all

UNITED SOCIETY OF CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR
MOUNT VERNON AND JOY STREETS

Dear Christian Herald:

Allow me to express my gratification that The Christian Herald for July 9th gave such splendid space to the Christian Endeavor movement. I am sure that the Endeavorers will appreciate your enterprise and generosity in this matter. We wish you had had a better subject to put upon the front page for I am sure he does not do justice to the rest of the paper.

Faithfully yours,

(signed) FRANCIS E. CLARK

Boston, July 13, 1921.

(The cover page, you will recall, was a portrait of Dr. Clark)

the State Governors. For a hundred years, we learn, all trace of it was lost. A copy of the prayer was found not long ago, and is to be placed in the new George Washington Memorial at Valley Forge, Pa.

"Almighty God! We make our earnest prayer that thou wilt keep the United States in thy holy protection; that thou wilt incline the hearts of the citizens to cultivate a spirit of subordination and obedience to government; and entertain a brotherly affection for one another and for their fellow-citizens at large; and finally that thou wilt most graciously be pleased to dispose us all to justice, to love mercy, and to be mean ourselves with that charity, humiliation and pacific temper of mind which were the characteristics of the divine Author of our blessed religion, and without a humble imitation of whose example in these things we can never hope to be a happy Nation.

"Grant our supplication, we beseech thee, through our Lord Jesus Christ. Amen."

A noble, beautiful and reverent prayer, which has lost none of its spiritual force and power of appeal in the long years that have passed since it was first offered. It might well serve as a model for us in these troubled days.

The South and the Sabbath

IT IS not a new experience for New York to be called to account for its disregard of the Lord's Day.

Yet the vast metropolis, with its mixed population of many nationalities, customs and religions, is by no means the wicked city some have pronounced it. If we may accept the estimate of the speakers at the big Christian Endeavor Convention, recently held here, it is a rather comfortable and safe place to live in. Dr. Clark and his associates have so declared, and they know how to judge of the moral and spiritual shortcomings of the average American city as well as of those of Europe.

However, as Dr. Talmage used to say, "The largest room in the world is room for improvement." We are conscious of the fact that, even without the infliction of blue laws, there is need of better Sabbath observance here and not here only, but throughout the whole country.

So when the representatives of the Southern Missouri Conference Committee, which includes nineteen conferences, notified us that they were about to visit New York and desired to lay before the metropolitan press their plans for a national campaign in behalf of better Sabbath keeping, in accordance with our long-established custom whenever a question of wide public interest is involved, we gladly acceded to their request that they might meet the newspaper men in the Christian Herald offices.

On Friday, July 15, the two delegates from Nashville met the representatives of the leading metropolitan dailies. Mr. Noah Webster Cooper, a Southern lawyer and lay preacher, explained that while he and his associate, the Rev. M. P. Woods, a Nashville pastor, represented the Central Committee of the Southern Methodist Conference, they were not affiliated with any of the existing movements for Sabbath Observance.

Their plan was to urge upon Congress the passage of a National Sunday Law bill, which would eliminate for one day in seven those features of our national life that dishonor God and destroy the sacred character of the Lord's Day. This he explained would exclude all interstate railway traffic on that day, Sunday mail delivery, Sunday newspapers, and the like. He would not advocate blue laws, for he "believed in being happy seven days a week." In a word, he would stop all Sunday labor, except such as could be reasonably regarded as work of necessity and mercy. Nor would he oppose innocent amusement, and recreation, when no work was performed.

Mr. Cooper, in conclusion, invited the newspapers to a frank discussion of the whole subject of Sunday Observance, which the Methodists of the South, he declared, regarded as vital to the nation at this time. He believed that if this nation continues to neglect the Lord's Day, it will inevitably share "the fate of the perished states of antiquity, which went to the wall after they had ignored God and his teachings."

Such was the message of these two earnest advocates of a Christian Sabbath in a Christian land. They came a long way to deliver it, and when they did, they spoke with the sincerity of conviction. Will the message from the South be heeded? Or will it pass and quickly be forgotten?

The Church and the Savings Bank

How One Minister Contributed to the World's Financial Structure

By B. J. O'DONNELL

IN THESE days of immense fortunes, gigantic corporations and globe-encircling business enterprises, when the dollar-mark seems to occupy a foremost position in the councils of the various nations, few men pause to consider the important part the Church has played in building the financial structure upon which rest the safety and weal of more than half the world.

In the one hundred and eleven years which have passed since the foundation of the first savings bank, the increased benefits accruing to the world from the savings institution have been tempered by the support of the Church. No great or vital movement in the history of the world's progress ever reached the peak of success without the approval of the Church. On the other hand, the Church, or inspiration gained from it, has guided those who have reached the highest pinnacles of success in literature, art and the sciences. The Bible stands as the greatest, the most enduring literature. Michael Angelo's "Moses" has never been surpassed as an example of what man may chisel out of a piece of marble. The life of Sir Isaac Newton, whose contribution to science effected the passing of a milestone in that field of endeavor, was greatly influenced by religion.

It is not surprising therefore, that a churchman—Rev. Henry Duncan, D.D., of Ruthwell, Dumfriesshire, Scotland—founded the first modern savings bank, the real cornerstone of the financial structure of the world.

Like all pioneers in movements affecting the masses, Dr. Duncan had to overcome prejudice, ridicule and fierce opposing forces before his plan was popularly received. That it never attained, in his lifetime at least, the measure of popularity he knew it deserved, is attested by the fact that four years before he died, in a letter to a friend, he wrote:

"It is sad to have been laboring for nearly half a century in the vineyard, and to have produced so little fruit."

Could this humble minister look down on the United States today he would find, as a great and abiding monument to his industry, 635 mutual savings banks with more than 10,000,000 small savers who, following his teachings of thrift and economy, have, according to the Savings Bank Association of the State of New York, deposited in these banks more than $6,000,000,000.

THE history of finance contains no more interesting chapter than that dealing with Dr. Duncan's struggle to establish the savings bank on Scottish soil.

Born at the Manse at Lochrutton, Kirkcudbrightshire, in 1774, Dr. Duncan was descended on both sides of his house from clerical ancestry, and during his lifetime could boast that he was connected with a hundred and fifty ministers of the Church of Scotland.

Early in life he became a firm believer and proponent of the evangelical school of thought. At sixteen he entered upon a business career, accepting a place in a mercantile house in Liverpool. Here he learned those fundamentals of finance which were of such great assistance to him in placing on a practical basis his future scheme for savings banks.

He was licensed as a preacher by the Presbytery of Dumfries, and accepted the living of Ruthwell parish in 1799. Immediately he became interested in the welfare and progress of the industrial classes. He found the conditions of his parishioners very distressing. Bad harvests, a scarcity of labor and high living costs contributed to the impoverished conditions in Ruthwell parish. After trying many plans to ameliorate these conditions Dr. Duncan's active philanthropic mind conceived the idea of employing many men in ditching and draining, going on the theory that the devil finds work for idle hands and that idleness engenders a dislike for useful employment. He brought Indian corn from Liverpool and sold it to the people, purchased flax to be spun by the women of the village and did many other things to inculcate thrift and industry in the hearts and minds of his people.

In 1810, while studying the problem of the poor laws, in which he took the greatest interest, he came across a paper called "Tranquillity." While reading this pamphlet, which contained much that was unpractical and visionary, he conceived an idea for enabling the prudent poor to provide for themselves, and set to work at once to develop the thought. Although discouraged on every hand, he had a deep and abiding faith in the system itself, and, despite opposition, persisted until, to his lasting honor, he achieved his object. In May, 1810, the first parochial Bank for Savings, as it was then called, was opened by Dr. Duncan. The project did not meet with immediate popularity. His parishioners were timid at first to entrust their savings to his keeping, but one by one he won their confidence and at the end of the first year he had received for deposits about $750. This was reckoned as a fair beginning in the circumstances.

OTHER sections of Scotland, hearing of the success of Dr. Duncan's new experiment, began to emulate the Ruthwell prototype. Within a few years similar institutions became so numerous and successful throughout the United Kingdom that they drew the attention of the Government.

In response to an avalanche of correspondence from all parts of the world Dr. Duncan published a pamphlet in 1814 with a view to making his savings bank plan more widely known among the nations, as he believed it suitable for the world at large as well as for the parish of Ruthwell.

He next turned his attention to placing the savings bank under government protection. In this move he was met with violent opposition by parliamentarians and even by important savings establishments which sprang up in the wake of the humble little bank at Ruthwell, and which were opposed to State interference. There were technical reasons in favor of government interference in England which did not apply to Scotland, so the Ruthwell minister was asked to draft a bill suitable for conditions in Scotland. When this bill was drawn Dr. Duncan, at the invitation of Mr. Douglas, M.P., went to London to engineer the passage of what later became known as the Bill of 1819. In recounting his experiences in London he wrote to a friend, "After a tough and one-time doubtful battle, I have at last carried the day triumphantly."

Under government protection savings banks increased in number in spite of the active opposition of the powerful London Times and the vitriolic Cobbett, who in a bitter article wrote what today would be considered a ludicrous statement—"The parsons appear to be main tools in this coaxing scheme."

A Helpful War Memorial

The Robert T. Fletcher Memorial School

A WAR memorial which will bring knowledge and joy to generations now is nearing completion eight miles from Bennettsville, S. C., the county seat of Marlboro County, in one of the most progressive rural sections of the South. It is a magnificent High School building and commemorates the heroic service of Robert T. Fletcher, a graduate of Wofford College and a soldier of the Rainbow Division, who died in France October 7, 1918, after being gassed at the battle front.

The building, which cost $200,000, is the gift of the hero's father, W. B. Fletcher, and uncle, J. A. Fletcher. It is an architectural gem, the front section being 172 x 40 feet and the rear section, which contains a spacious auditorium, 100 x 60 feet. The structure is three stories high and contains twelve class rooms, library and offices. In the basement is a kitchen, well equipped, for the teaching of domestic science. As the Robert T. Fletcher Memorial School is located in the famous Pee Dee section, in the county which holds the world's championship yield of corn with 254 3/4 bushels to an acre, agriculture will have an important part in its curriculum. Just across the campus, the patrons are erecting a handsome teacherage.

A STUDY of Dr. Duncan's bank will show that the great modern savings banks of the world have followed closely the plan of organization first put in operation by the Scottish minister. None knew better than he that the savings bank should first be thoroughly organized and that while philanthropic in its management should be far from being a charity in its benefit. He reasoned that "the only way by which the higher ranks can give aid to the lower in their temporal concerns, without aiding them to their ruin, is by affording every possible encouragement to industry and virtue, and by judiciously rewarding extraordinary efforts of economy."

While studying the question of poor laws he had come to the conclusion that in poor families there are scraps of income which are likely to be thoughtlessly spent in little extravagances. Because of this weakness in human beings he planned to induce people to awaken to the value of savings; "to reward them from the interest from investments and not from charitable contributions; to run a bank upon the earning power of money at work rather than from the generosity of friends."

His banks had three classes of members—ordinary, composed of the poor parishioners who deposited; extraordinary, composed of those who paid into an auxiliary fund a certain amount; and honorary, composed of those who paid a larger sum in to the auxiliary fund. A Court of Directors consisting of the Governor, the Treasurer, five directors and one or more trustees, chosen from the honorary and extraordinary members, managed the bank. The court, in turn, was supervised by a standing committee of fifteen men chosen from the members. The "General Meeting" composed of all members of the last two classes, and all ordinary members of six months' standing formed a sort of "guiding" committee. It will readily be seen that Duncan's bank was over-organized and had more elaborate machinery than a modern hundred million dollar-bank.

DR. DUNCAN'S plan spread to other countries and eventually found its way to the United States. According to Emerson W. Keyes, in "A History of Savings Banks in the United States," the first public announcement of the purpose to establish a savings bank appeared in the "Christian Disciple" for December, 1816, a small religious monthly published in Boston. It was in the following words:

"SAVINGS BANKS"

"Under this novel title, it is proposed to form an institution in Boston, for the security and improvements of the savings of persons in humble life, until required by their wants and desires. A meeting of gentlemen has been called, and a large and respectable committee appointed to apply to the legislature (now in session) for an act of incorporation, and to digest suitable rules and by-laws, to be proposed to an adjourned meeting. Similar institutions exist in England and Scotland; in the former place under the appellation of 'Provident Institutions for Savings,' and in the latter of 'Savings Banks.' The Edinburgh Review, No. 49, and the Pamphleteer, No. 14, contain essays on the subject, explaining their objects and principles, and narrating their beneficial effects."

"In Philadelphia it is proposed to establish one of the societies. We agree in the following sentiment, and wish every success to the laudable schemes contemplated: 'It is not by the alms of the wealthy, that the good of the lower class can be generally promoted. By such donations, encouragement is far oftener given to idleness and hypocrisy, than aid to suffering worth. He is the most effective benefactor to the poor, who encourages them in habits of industry, sobriety and frugality.'"

Subsequently, on December 13, 1816, the "Provident Institution for Savings in the Town of Boston," was chartered, and as Keyes says, "This was the first public act of legislation in the world which recognized the beneficent character of savings banks and invested them with the sanction and protection of the law."

So, it will be seen that if, as Emerson says, "Every great institution is the lengthened shadow of a man," the savings banks of the world, with their billions of dollars in deposits, must therefore be the lengthened shadow of Rev. Henry Duncan, "Father of the modern savings bank."

Eyes and Wheels

A Sermon by REV. J. H. JOWETT, D.D.*

TEXT—Ezek. 1 : 10. "They four had the face of a man, and the face of a lion, on the right side; and they four had the face of an ox on the left side; and they four also had the face of an eagle." Ezek. 10 : 12. "And the wheels, were full of eyes round about."

THIS is very unlike any symbolism which we should use today. It seems primitive, childish, grotesque. And it surely is grotesque, if we attempt to make a composed picture of it and try to present it in sketchy outline to the eye of the imagination. We cannot discover the prophet's mind if we proceed in that sort of patient and laborious completeness.

That is not how the quick symbolizing wits of the Oriental go about their work. The Oriental is swift in running discernment, and he gives the detached discernments names, and the names are borrowed from material things. The swift descriptions are not intended to figure forth a character, as a lightning artist gives you a face in a moment; they rather give us characteristics, and many of the characteristics may seem inconsistent with one another. The Oriental mind does not stay to resolve the apparent inconsistencies into unity and symmetrical character. It just goes on naming the characteristics, and allows the character to take care of itself.

It is even so in the Book of Revelation. Things are swiftly touched and named, and the characterization is done by bold analogy. For instance, a creature is seen with uprearing might and passion, and the witness gives the carnal strength the name of dragon. But he watches more closely, and he catches sight of a sort of seemingly innocent playfulness about the dragon, and he names the harmless friskiness "lamb's horns"; and you get the strange combination of a dragon which is also part of a lamb.

Is it not even so with John's description of our Lord in the Book of Revelation? He looks upon his Lord's eyes, and they are pure, and lustrous, and piercing; and he describes them as "a flame of fire." He listens to His voice, and it is full, and deep, and musical, and he describes it "as the sound of many waters." He listens to His words of truth, smiting all falsehood, and hypocrisy, and pretence; and he sees as it were "a sharp two-edged sword" "going out of His mouth." All this is typical of an Oriental habit of mind. It gives us a swift characterization of qualities. The Oriental lays hold of essential elements and names them. And the work of the interpreter, who reads their words, is to follow the lines of direction suggested by the symbols until we find the apparently contradictory qualities nestling together in the secret place of the soul.

WELL, here are strange creatures which the prophet Ezekiel sees living and moving in the immediate Presence of God, and going forth on great errands of mercy and judgment. And my interest in them is just this: What they are ought to be my ideal, and what they reflect in a royal and superlative degree ought to indicate the line of my progress in the path of aspiration and growth.

Now, let us mark how this great prophet, with his symbolizing mind, portrays the characteristics of these strange presences. He first of all mentions their wealth of nature. He sees their souls characterized by a certain constancy of adoration. They are ever poised in humility before the holiness of God. And the prophet lays hold of this element in their character, and he suggests it by saying that they have "the face of a cherub."

And then he notices a certain humanness about them, a tender element of pity and service, and he signifies it by saying that they have "the face of a man." He watches them again and he observes a certain mystic strength and regality. They have a power of will which cannot be turned aside; and the prophet names it "the face of a lion." And yet again he marks a certain loftiness of deportment. They have a swift power of soaring into high places, and the prophet suggests this quality in saying that they have "the face of an eagle." Such are the manifold characteristics of their spiritual wealth.

But even now the prophet's observation is not ended. He marks their swift discernments, powers of intuition, powers of sight and insight and foresight, powers of apprehension and appreciation. And how would he suggest these strong faculties of observation? He does it by saying that they were "full of eyes round about." And yet once again he observes the swiftness of their movements—he notes that discernment is followed by action. And as he marks the speed of their mission he can think of nothing but wheels. I suppose it was suggested by chariot wheels, such as he could see any day racing along the roads of Babylon.

Well, I suggest that these characteristics of the mystical spirits that minister in the immediate presence of God are characteristics of all ideal character. These are qualities which should be found in men and women who, even on earth, are seeking communion with their Lord, and are ambitious for service in the ministries of His kingdom. We, too, ought to possess a deep and varied wealth of nature; we, too, should be endowed with swiftness of execution; we, too, ought to aspire after an all-round capacity of vision. These ought to be our characteristics—depth of spirit, clarity of eye, speed of wheel.

LET us survey them again and see how we stand in the judgment. I say then that these beings were distinguished by great wealth of nature. They were four-faced, having the mysticism of the cherub, and the humanness of a man, and the strength of a lion, and the loftiness of an eagle. All these are qualities suggesting large powers of fellowship, powers which will realize and feel the life about them in full and interpreting apprehension.

Walter Bagehot has a very illuminating word on Shakespeare; he says that Shakespeare's cardinal distinction was "an experiencing nature." Shake-perceiving has been increased. Our discernments have crossed class lines, and sect lines, and the lines of vocation, and sex lines, and racial lines. We have been pulled about in every direction. We have been stretched by the harsh ripping of imperious circumstances, and I think we are experiencing life more widely than perhaps men have ever experienced it before in the history of the world.

And with the larger capacity of experiencing life there is a consequent enrichment of vision. We have more eyes than we have ever had before. We have keener powers of discernment. We are seeing realities which have been hid. Dead statistics have come to life and are seen walking about as men and women. Dead information has been vitalized by the imagination. We are getting the cubical contents of things. Once opaque facts are becoming like glass houses. I think this is one of the outstanding distinctions of our day, the opening of the eyes and the powers of vision.

AND with deeper nature, and with more expert eyes, there has come a swifter power of wheel. What a mighty pace has been given to human movements by the war! The contrast between the pre-war days and the present day is the difference between the farmer's cart, pulled by an old horse, ambling along the country road, and an Assyrian chariot, racing across the plains. What power of wheel! What things Congress has done at a single sitting! What things the British House of Commons has passed in a single night! Impossibilities have just raced into being. Things which in old times would have dragged along through years of debate have found body and breath in a day.

And so I think we have had great developments in our experiencing nature and great growth in the keenness and amplitude of our vision, and great increase in the swiftness of our actions. I think we may say that we have grown in power of spirit, and in power of eye, and in power of wheel. Or to drop the figure we may surely say that the life of our time is distinguished by a larger personal consciousness, by a finer social conscience, and by a swifter moral venture.

AND while I think we have grown in our power to apprehend social and national wrongs, and while we have been swift in movements toward their removal, our growth has not been so distinguished in our appreciation of the deepest things of men. There are still whole nations without the Gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ. They are sitting in darkness and in the shadow of death. Is our experiencing nature sufficiently refined and vigilant to realize their terrible deprivation? Have we any feeling for the people of Thibet, or for the unnumbered multitudes in Mongolia, or for the myriads of unenlightened men and women in Africa? When we think of them, is our heart moved in painful wonder, and are we quickened in chivalrous desire to help them? I am afraid that we must confess that in these realms of human necessity our powers of appreciation are still dull and faint.

And then there are the spiritual needs of our own land, and especially, I think, the spiritual needs of the well-to-do. How many of us are stirred into grief and holy ministry when we think of the multitudes of rich people who are living without Christ? They have everything but the one thing: they have all that heart can wish except the very thing for which the heart most craves. They have the world, but they are without the Lord. Who thinks about them? Who pities them? Who has a sufficiently deep wealth of nature which thrills to their necessity? Who has eyes that are keen enough to discern their desolation? Who has powers of service that are swift as chariot wheels? The answers to these questions will disclose the comparative dullness of our fellowship in the cardinal purpose for which our Saviour came and died.

But here is the wonderful thing—we can obtain this deeper experiencing nature, and this keener sight, and this swifter movement by seeking a more intimate communion with the Lord Himself. It is in fellowship that we share His life. What He is we become. We become partakers of His nature; we become sharers of His vision; we become expert in keeping pace with Him along the road of service. All our springs are in Him.

Closing Hymn—"Nearer, My God, to Thee," or "Jesus, Lover of My Soul."

Benediction—By Pastor Charles M. Sheldon, to be read aloud:

Father of mercy, have mercy on all who need Thee, and we all do. Father of justice, make us to be content with Thy goodness, which will not do wrong to any soul of man. Father of eternal light and life, lift our souls above the mist into the sunshine of immortality as we part from one another to find ourselves in Thy presence forever. In Jesus' name we ask it. AMEN.

speare had power to get into the lives of other people, and to look from their eyes and survey their world. He could do it with people who were very unlike one another. He could do it with Brutus and Iago. He could get into the lives of Miranda and Caliban. He could appreciate the mighty differences between Portia and Falstaff. His experiencing nature enabled him to apprehend and appreciate the experimental life of others.

But when I want to find an experiencing nature of a truly imperial order, I turn to the apostle Paul. His experiencing nature enabled him to enter into the lives of men and women who were strangely different in inner gift and outward conditions. He was able to feel the life of Jerusalem; he was able to enter into the life of Corinth. He was able to appreciate the very different life of Athens. "And unto the Jews I became as a Jew that I might gain the Jews; to them that are under the law, as under the law, that I might gain them that are under the law; to them that are without law, as without law, that I might gain them that are without law. To the weak became I as weak, that I might gain the weak. I am made all things to all men, that I might by all means save some." What a wealth of spirit this man had! What a wealth of experiencing nature! One moment he had the face of a cherub, another moment he had the face of a man. Another moment he had the face of a lion. Another moment he had the face of an eagle.

Now, have we much of this experiencing nature today? Are we great in fellow-feeling? My own conviction is that we have been greatly enlarged by the happenings of the last few years. Our range of ex-

Feeding His Flock

SUNDAY. Ezekiel 34:15. "I will feed my flock." The Lord's feeding of His children is tenderly discriminating, and to bring us to maturity He uses very varied breads. Let us glance at two or three of the breads which are mentioned in the Sacred Work.

"I will feed thee in a good pasture," saith the Lord. Yes, sometimes that is the seasonable feeding-place for the soul. "He maketh me to lie down in green pastures," and there we should always like to remain. There are sweet and beautiful seasons, when life ceases to be a noisy, tumultuous river, when it settles down into "still waters," and we are blessed with quiet visions which come as Heaven's bread. The good Lord permits us at times to just lie down and dream. "Your young men shall see visions, and your old men shall dream dreams." Beautiful are these seasons of holy communion, when life becomes a river of stillness, and we contemplate the things which are divine. The Lord is feeding us in a "fat pasture," giving us meat in due season.

"I will feed thee with the bread of tears." That is another of the means by which I am to pass out of babyhood into manhood, out of initial straits into "the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ."

Tears as bread! I do not think it means the tears we shed because of our own griefs, but tears we shed because of the grief of others. These tears constitute bread, and enlarge our souls. Sympathy is feeding. It has sometimes happened that a whole family has been fed by the presence of an invalid child. Tender tones have stolen into the voice; a strange gentleness has come into the hand; the loud, thoughtless tramp has gone out of the footfall; jangling has given place to a subdued harmony which has been "like snatches from the songs above." The affections have been made more and more sensitive, responsive and vibrant to another's grief. "When Jesus therefore saw her weeping, He groaned in the spirit, and was troubled." Our Saviour was being fed with "the bread of tears!"

"I will feed My flock." The good Lord has many breads. "Give us this day our daily bread."

The Power of the Word

MONDAY. Psa. 119:105. "The Word is a Light." Take a map of the world and draw a line separating the nations that receive the Scriptures from those that reject them, and you have divided between civilization and barbarism, between poverty and prosperity, between selfishness and philanthropy, between freedom and oppression, between darkness and light.

Progress is a fact; and, for some reason, the Bible has gone hand in hand with progress all along the ages. It has come down through history waving a torch, like Milton's angel of the morning; so that institutions of charity and enlightenment have sprung up everywhere along its way.

It would appear that this singular fact can be accounted for only by conceding a divine power to the Scriptures as the Veritable Word of God.

The Bible is the best seller in the book markets of the world. It is conceded that its popularity does not establish its truth; but let it be remembered that this general acceptance is co-extensive with the history of civilized man.

Let it be remembered that the grip of the Bible has been strengthened from century to century, on an ever increasing multitude.

Let it be remembered that those who accept it are foremost among the enlightened nations of the earth.

And let it be remembered that in this company are and always have been many of the wisest minds.

Were John Locke and Sir Isaac Newton and Lord Bacon incapable of sound reasoning? Are the thousands on thousands of scholars and thinkers, scientists and philosophers, who accept the Scriptures as their infallible rule of faith and practice, all victims of a singular delusion? Are there so many stupid and credulous dupes among the deep thinkers of this world of ours?

Striving Toward Perfection

TUESDAY. I Cor. 14:12. "Seek that ye might excel." There is no termination without determination. Backbone is stronger than wishbone. A minister of whom we have heard owns a book of which he is very proud. It was given to him as a prize by his teacher, and on the fly-leaf are these words. "Given to A. because he tried." Better to try and fail than not make the attempt. Impossibilities are the failures of lazy people. Goals are won and heights reached by persevering, while the highway of life is strewn with the wrecks of those who ask, "What is the use?" "It can't be done!" All worthy achievements are the rewards of those who said, "Nevertheless, we will try to do it." But for barriers, the spirit of adventure and desire for conquest would long have perished out of the world.

Obstacles do not come between us and our work because obstacles are a part of our work. Set stone upon stone forbiddingly, and before the mortar is dry, some daring soul will have plotted to overleap the barrier or batter down the structure. "Who built the first wall raised the first rebel." "The glory to be revealed" is the lure that puts the iron in the blood, the morale in the will and the high purpose in the heart.

We may never reach perfection, but we shall not get anywhere without a striving after perfection. He who does not desire to do more than he can will always do less than he ought. Unless we aim higher than we hope to hit, we shall hit so low as to be ashamed of our aim. So long as the attempt is made so much of success is attained. "She hath done what she could" was the tribute the Master paid to sincerity of purpose. Angels can do no more. "Thou didst well in that it was in thine heart" was the verdict in behalf of David.

Individual effort makes for collective beauty. The world is beautiful in its vastness because it is, first of all, beautiful in its atoms. My best may not be your best, and my failure may be your success; but whether we succeed or fail is not the question so much as whether we have striven earnestly, labored consistently and sought diligently.

The Power of Pain

WEDNESDAY. II Cor. 12:9—"Most gladly, therefore will I glory in my weakness." Human suffering will no doubt increase the luster of Jerusalem the Golden. It gilds the gloom of sorrow with rainbows of hope. It is glorious to realize, while in pain, that the Lord God omnipotent reigneth, that the whole earth shall be filled with His glory, that He watches above His own, ruling with love and almighty strength. He Who clothes the grass, decks the flowers, feeds the birds, will not forget the children of His bosom, who can love Him in return for His blessing.

In this life Paul may be in a prison and Nero in a palace, but, like the rich man and Lazarus, they will change places in final rewards. Clouds may veil God's love, yet He is always true. The laws of nature are in harmony with the idea of suffering; the atmosphere is composed of four parts of nitrogen, a poison, and one part of oxygen, the living principle. Too much oxygen would destroy the body as surely as too much prosperity destroys the soul. In nature we find night as well as day, storm succeeding sunshine and winter following summer. Suffering therefore seems as essential to the soul as medicine for the ills of the body.

Joseph went from a pit of pain to a throne of power; Jacob never walked straight till he limped. Job would have been unknown but for his trials. David sang sweetest in the darkened chambers of sorrow, as birds sing best in cages. Paul's ills of the flesh, which were not healed in answer to prayer, led him to take Luke with him as a physician in all his travels. Thus Paul's affliction in body indirectly caused the writing of the book of the Acts and the Gospel of Luke. The Puritans, the Huguenots and the Covenanters, like the apostles and the martyrs, came up through "great tribulation," having their robes washed in the blood of the Lamb.

The Acts of the Modern Apostles

THURSDAY. Acts 1: "The former treatise have I made, O Theophilus, of all that Jesus began both to do and to teach." Thus Luke began the Acts of the Apostles. The "former treatise" was the gospel of Luke, and it was a summary "of all that Jesus began to do and to teach." Now Luke is writing another book called "The Acts of the Apostles," a kind of a sequel to the Gospel, a record of all that Jesus continued to do and to teach. There is room and material for still another book, which might be titled "The Acts of Jesus through the modern Apostles."

The revelation of God is a daily occurrence. His manifestations through men and women, in institutions and organizations, like His mercies, are new every morning. The canon of Scripture can never be closed. As Pilgrim Pastor Robinson declared "God has yet more light to shed from His Word," so may we look for the footprints of the Almighty on the sands of today, the hand of Omnipotence on the events of the hour, and the thought of the Divine Fashioner guiding the intricate pattern of His eternal plan and purpose on the loom of existence. Foreign mission field, city slum and distant home frontier are vibrant with Kingdom ideals and electric with the heroism of the Christ intent and redemptive theme. Never have men and women, in public and private, striven so efficiently and wrought so heroically for the new and better day of peace on earth and good will among nations. The nations are coming together, even though slowly, nevertheless surely, in a beautiful blendhood and brotherhood of co-operative endeavor and mutual accord for the highest and best aims for all concerned.

"And there are also many other things which Jesus did, the which, if they should be written every one, I suppose that even the world itself could not contain the books that should be written." Thus does John close his gospel. Reluctantly he lays down his pen. The acts of grace and love, the theme of redemption and reclamation may never be told in such a way that we shall do them justice. That, however, is no reason why we should not at least try to do our best, and, in the economy of God, "gather up the fragments that nothing be lost," going forth like Ruth of old, glean- ing in the fields, picking up this and that of the ripened grain and using it to appease the world's hunger for the bread that gives strength and blessing.

Christ and the Spirit of Youth

FRIDAY. Matt. 19:22. "But when the young man heard that saying, he went away sorrowful: for he had great possessions." If this rich young ruler had taken a long view of life he would have followed Christ. He was attracted to Christ, even as Christ was attracted to him. There is no doubt this youth saw in Christ what conservative and time-blinded age failed to see. Most of Christ's disciples were young men.

There is a remarkable group of young men in the New Testament, friends of Paul—Timothy, Titus and John Mark. Augustine was a young man when he fell a captive to the truth and grace of Christ. So were the other three greatest fathers of the early Church: Jerome, Ambrose and Gregory. Of the martyrs of ancient and modern times, many were young men and women. Of the great reformers, not a few were scarcely older than Jesus when He began His ministry. Luther was only thirty-four when he sounded the trumpet note of the Reformation.

There is a native sympathy, a spiritual kinship, between Christ and the spirit of youth. The spirit of youth is idealistic, adventurous, militant. So is the spirit of Christ. To the true Christian, difficulties do not exist, or if they do, they exist only to be overcome.

What adventure is the Christian life! It challenges the strong and the daring. It is a venture into the realms of truth, love and heroism. Moreover, the Christian life is a warfare, a crusade. It requires courage. Sir Philip Sidney said, "If there is a good war I will go to it." What better war is there for a young man to go to than that which is being waged under the banner of the Cross? "Ye that are men now serve Him."

God Our Refuge and Helper

SATURDAY. Psalm 42, 11. "Why art thou cast down, O my soul? Hope thou in God, for I shall yet praise Him Who is the health of my countenance and my God." David's songs in sorrow have awakened every chord of feeling in the human heart. They express his own spiritual biography in their outflow of emotion and melody. It is not better conditions or circumstances that we pray for; environment is always subject to change. But it is the everlasting God our arms would clasp when the soul whispers, "My Father, My Saviour, My Lord!" I must know that my Redeemer liveth and dwelleth in me, speaking peace to the troubled waves of sorrow in order to complete tranquillity of spirit.

Is it not a help to remember the deliverances of past years, when He was the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, knowing that hitherto He hath helped His followers in all their trials? I will therefore praise Him who hath been the help of my countenance all my life; my hope shall ever be in my Creator and Guide! He fills the aching void in my disquieted, disappointed spirit. He is nearer than breathing, closer than hands and feet. When all the waves flow over me, He walks upon the waters by my side. His "Peace, be still!" quiets every billow. It is then I know my Father's house is my home; His heart my hiding-place. It is only love that will satisfy love. Out of His fullness I received grace and peace. O that all who are a-thirst may come and take of the water of life freely, drinking from a pure river, flowing from the throne of God and the Lamb. Fountains of wealth and pleasure will never satisfy!

The forty-second Psalm is the Psalm of a troubled world, the cry of prisoners for liberty, freedom from the slavery of the passions, from bereavement, misrepresentation, persecution, poverty and famine. Hope thou in God! He will not tarry—He will surely come!

THE BISHOP OF SPARTA

Head of the Greek Orthodox Church in America, in the gorgeous and costly vestments which he wears for special church ceremonies

Japan Seeks to Limit Far Eastern Discussion

THE Japanese Cabinet has decided, according to Tokio newspapers, to approve President Harding's proposal for a discussion of Pacific and Far Eastern questions in connection with the international conference on limitation of armaments, but will decline to take up several of the most important problems over which there are differences between the United States and Japan. Japan will decline, it was said, to discuss questions affecting sovereign rights of participants and also the Shantung and Yap questions, which it holds were settled by the Paris peace conference. The United States does not admit that the Shantung and Yap problems have been settled, and there was a suggestion that these and other points of difference might be adjusted through conferences between Japan and America in advance of the opening of the main conference.

Tokio's program for the conference was reported to be insistence on a world-wide policy of the "open door" and equal opportunity for all. In line with this she would propose a thorough opening up of China, abolition of extra-territoriality, spheres of influence and the withdrawal of all foreign powers from control of China government services, while demanding recognition of racial equality and the principle of dropping the bars to Japanese immigration. These demands, it should be frankly understood, would not be put forward with any real hope of an agreement on them. On the other hand they would be good trading arguments for use against the United States and the British dominions with interests in the Pacific.

In British circles, there were suggestions that the conference should be held next spring instead of this autumn, in order that the Premiers of the British dominions might be able to attend and in order to give Premier Lloyd George a chance to carry through the Irish negotiations. The idea of holding a preliminary conference in London was losing favor and it was believed any and all conferences in relation to the main conference would be held in Washington. American officials did not take kindly to the suggestions for delay, believing the problems to be considered are so important and so pressing that an attempt should be made to solve them as soon as possible.

De Valera Gets British Terms

CARRYING a typewritten document setting forth the definite proposals of the British government for a settlement of the Irish problem, Eamonn de Valera has returned from London to Dublin to confer with his colleagues of the Irish Republican party. The British terms offer to Ireland self-government such as now is enjoyed by Canada and the Union of South Africa, with reservations of military and naval character deemed advisable because of the island's nearness to the center of the British Empire. While the Irish leaders are considering them, the truce will continue in effect.

Announcement was made in London, at the close of the series of long conversations between Premier Lloyd George and Mr. de Valera, that no basis for a formal conference had been found as yet but that Mr. de Valera would communicate with the Premier again after the discussions in Dublin. This statement, over which the conferees labored for some time before reaching a draft acceptable to both sides, was less encouraging than the public had hoped for, but the optimism manifested by the participants in the conference and the continuation of the parleys indicated greater progress than the statement itself conveyed.

On the night preceding the final conference of the series, Premier Lloyd George presided over a cabinet council at which the Irish proposals of the government were discussed at length. The financial arrangements to be offered to the Irish Republican leaders caused considerable trouble, but at last all the various provisions were agreed to by the ministers almost unanimously. The Premier then went to Buckingham Palace and laid the proposals before the King, who has been keeping in close touch with the Irish situation.

Ulster's attitude put somewhat of a damper on optimism regarding the final outcome. Sir James Craig, the Ulster Premier, was in London part of the time the conference was in progress, but did not meet Mr. de Valera. Before returning to Belfast, he issued a statement which indicated a determination to maintain Ulster's present status, thus opposing the Sinn Fein contention that the province is in the minority and must yield to the majority in Ireland. "It now merely remains for Mr. de Valera and the British people to come to terms regarding the area outside of that of which I am Prime Minister," the Craig statement said. "When this is accomplished I can promise cordial co-operation on equal terms with Southern Ireland in any matter affecting our common interests." The Ulster Premier is to return to London for further discussions and his attitude was not allowed to block the parleys.

House Passes Tariff Bill

THE Fordney Tariff bill has been passed by the House by a vote of 289 to 127, seven Republicans voting against the measure and seven Democrats for it on the final roll call. On three of the five most hotly contested schedules, the Democrats, aided by dissatisfied members of the majority, were able to carry amendments. As a result hides, long staple cotton, asphalt and oil were placed on the free list and the Longworth dye embargo was eliminated. An attempt to strike out the American valuation and reciprocal duties provisions was defeated, 289 to 127.

In the Senate, the program was to refer the measure to the Finance Committee, which expected to devote a month to hearings on the bill and to make many changes in the measure. Meanwhile it was believed that the House would have been able to complete the tax revision bill, prompt action on which is desired by President Harding, and that the Senate would take up the tax bill ahead of the tariff measure, which thus might be delayed until the December session of Congress. It was proposed in administration circles that Congress should take a recess for two months after the House had passed the tax revision bill.

Greeks Capture Eski-Shehr

THE Greek drive against the Turkish Nationalists has been proceeding successfully and the forces of King Constantine have captured Eski-Shehr, near which they met a big defeat in their previous offensive. The occupation of Eski-Shehr was preceded by the capture of Kutaia, about thirty miles to the southwest, after a battle lasting four days, in which both sides suffered heavy losses. Four Greek columns converged on Kutaia, one of their principal objectives, and drove the Kemalists from their fortified positions before the town. The Greeks reported as the spoils of this victory more than 15,000 prisoners, 168 guns and 2,000 camels—a disastrous loss for Mustapha Kemal, whose number of effectives has been placed at 100,000 men and whose supply of artillery has been limited.

Beyond Eski-Shehr the Turks took up strong positions prepared in advance. Hellenic leaders believed that the Kemalists had lost their principal defensive line and termed Eski-Shehr the key to Angora, Mustapha Kemal's capital. It is the junction of railroads running from Constantinople and Smyrna to Angora, from which it is 125 miles distant.

An attempt by the Turks to take the offensive and recapture Eski-Shehr was defeated and the Greeks, enveloping their positions, drove them back with heavy losses, capturing an entire Turkish division.

France Sending Troops to Silesia

GREAT BRITAIN and France again have been at odds over the Upper Silesian controversy, with the British urging that an Allied conference to effect a settlement be called at once and France seeking further delay.

The British government sent to Paris a note warning that there was danger in postponing a decision and suggesting that the project of expert examination of the project should be given up. Paris replied to this with an announcement that she was despatching more troops to Silesia, as she believed the Allied forces in the disputed territory should be strengthened greatly before judgment is rendered. The French wished Britain to send reinforcements, arguing that it would be time for the Premiers to meet to make the final decision on boundaries after the Allied troops are in readiness to put down any revolt and after the experts have reached an agreement. It was feared both Germany and Poland might try to seize by force the districts they claim unless there are enough Allied troops in the province to enforce obedience to the Allied decree.

Later the British and the French officials reached a compromise under which it was expected France would agree to a meeting of the Supreme Council early in August and would withdraw her demand for a meeting of experts, while Britain would join with France in asking free passage through Germany for reinforcements. A compromise on the question of boundaries also was forecast.

Suggestions of American mediation were renewed unofficially, but careful observers expected Washington to maintain its aloof attitude unless it appeared there was no other way of averting a new outbreak of hostilities in Eastern Europe.

Illinois Governor Indicted

GOVERNOR LEN SMALL of Illinois, Lieutenant Governor Fred E. Sterling and Vernon Curtis of Grant Park have been indicted by the Sagamon County Grand Jury on charges of embezzling public funds, conspiracy to defraud the state and operation of a "confidence game" in connection with interest earnings of the State Treasurer's office during the terms of Small and Sterling. The three were charged with conspiracy to defraud the state of $2,000,000 and with the embezzlement of $700,000; Governor Small was accused of embezzling $500,000; and Lieutenant Governor Sterling, $500,000.

The Grand Jury's report, which called for an exhaustive legislative inquiry, alleged that several million dollars of state funds had been kept on deposit

A CITY SUBSTITUTE FOR THE "OLD SWIMMIN' HOLE"

During hot summer days Boston officials have attached open air shower-pipes to the fire hydrants in order to cool off the youngsters. Street showers also have been used in New York and other cities in the Grant Park State Bank, which is said to have had no other depositor, and that this money was used to buy at discount short-term securities on which large profits were realized while the state received not more than 2 per cent. interest.

Governor Small issued a statement in which he declared his absolute innocence and asserted the Grand Jury had conducted a "one-sided hearing, in which personal and political enemies were heard, and I had no voice." He attributed the charges to a desire to accomplish his "political assassination" and to personal fury aroused by his attempts to hold appropriations down to the minimum. There has been intense bitterness between the Republican factions in Illinois, and earlier disclosures in the political warfare had prepared the public for the returning of indictments.

$4,500,000 GIVEN FOR CHICAGO CHARITIES. One of the largest individual gifts for charity ever made in Chicago has been completed in the transfer to the Chicago Charitable Corporation of fourteen pieces of real estate which go to make up a $4,500,000 fund. The corporation was created to administer the fund for the benefit of various philanthropies.

AERIAL BOMBS SINK DREADNOUGHT. Army airplanes dropping TNT bombs weighing 2,000 pounds sent to the bottom the former German dreadnought Ostfriesland in tests conducted sixty miles outside the Virginia Capes, six such bombs being dropped before the warship sank. A day's attacks with smaller bombs had failed to put the vessel out of commission.

EIGHT DROWN IN TEXAS. Eight persons, most of them delegates to a Baptist Young People's Union convention, were drowned after being caught in the undertow of the Gulf of Mexico, while bathing near Palacios, Texas.

DR. POLING RECOVERING. The friends of Dr. Daniel A. Poling, associate president of the United Society of Christian Endeavor, who was seriously injured in an automobile accident on July 4, will be delighted to know that his complete recovery is promised. Dr. Poling suffered a fracture of the lumbar vertebrae. He will remain in a hospital in Northampton, Mass., to which he was taken, until August 20th, and will be confined to his bed for probably two months longer. By that time the surgeons assure his family he will be his old virile self.

TERMS FOR RUSSIAN RELIEF OUTLINED. Herbert Hoover, as head of the American Relief Administration, has replied to the appeal of Maxim Gorky, noted Russian author, for aid for the starving in Soviet Russia with an outline of the terms upon which relief can be offered. In addition to the same conditions laid down in twenty-three other foreign countries in which the administration is working, Mr. Hoover stated that "to the whole American people the absolute sine qua non of any assistance must be the immediate release of the Americans now held prisoners in Russia."

REV. DR. SCOFIELD DIES. Rev. Dr. Cyrus Ingerson Scofield, a prominent Southern Presbyterian clergyman, editor of the Scofield Reference Bible and for several years in charge of the Moody Church at Northfield, Mass., died at his home at Douglaston, L. I., at the age of seventy-eight.

HUGE FIRE LOSS IN MEXICAN OIL FIELD. Property losses estimated at several million dollars were caused in the Amatlan oil fields near Tampico, Mexico, by a fire which was attributed to lightning. Four thousand men working in relays finally checked the conflagration.

SPANISH DEFEATED IN MOROCCO. Following a severe reverse for Spanish troops at the hands of rebel tribesmen in Morocco, the general in command and the members of his staff committed suicide on the field of battle after having made sure of the retreat of their forces, according to Madrid despatches.

YOU HAVE A FRIEND

WHAT do you think of him? Or do you think of him at all, except in a casual sort of way when you meet him on the street?

Have you a feeling for him that makes you interested in his interests, sympathetic with his sorrows, concerned for his success, rejoicing in his joys? If not you are not much of a friend to boast of, are you?

It is pretty difficult sometimes to prove up to these requirements, but after all, there are a surprising number of people in this world who have shown their capacity for friendship of the most unselfish kind, and the world is infinitely better for them having lived in it.

You can't be a friend and a "taker." You have to be a "giver" too, and usually the more you give in terms of loyalty, and affection, and personal interest, and understanding, the more you receive from the relationship.

It is not enough, either, to give of those things that are pleasing alone to the heart and the body. One of the greatest pleasures of genuine friendship is the mutual stimulation of the mind and the development of the soul. And this can be accomplished in two ways: by intellectual companionship or by placing at the hand of your friend reading matter that will express to him the ideals that govern your life. There is force to the latter method because a book or a magazine is a companion whose influence is often strongest at those moments when human company is impossible and probably undesirable.

We know of no better manifestation of friendship than a gift of the Christian Herald. Its influence is good on soul, mind and body. And you know more than one of your friends it is certain to make into a better man or woman—into a better Christian character.

Paul in Iconium and Lystra

International Sunday-School Lesson for August 14

Acts 14:1-28

By REV. SAMUEL D. PRICE, D. D.

"ONE more day's work for Jesus" has been often sung at an evening prayer service when the events of the day have hardly warranted such a statement. As Paul and Barnabas wrought at Antioch, Iconium, Lystra and Derbe, they could have rendered this hymn with a rich meaning as they sought rest after the last inquirer had departed. Paul, at least, was bearing in his body the marks of suffering for Christ's sake. He was filling full his ministry, for which he had been commissioned with Barnabas at Antioch on the Orontes. Paul's conversion meant everything to him and his religion was costing him much.

Good work in the past, as at Antioch in Pisidia, does not cause Paul to say, as do some modern church members, "It is enough." He and his companions journey the eighty miles to Iconium where they again begin work in the synagogue of the Jews. Here the Lord confirms their faithful witnessing by "granting signs and wonders." Jews and Gentiles soon form an alliance and treat the preachers shamefully and are even purposing to use stones. God always has other sheep which need shepherding, and our true soldiers hasten on to Lystra, which is eighteen miles distant, "and there they preached the gospel." In no respect had they failed at Antioch or Iconium. They were sent forth to witness through life and message and this has been accomplished. Personal victory consists in perfect obedience. It is possible for the Christian to obey his Captain with the same obedience as does the soldier his superior officer. Paul was not a coward in departing from Iconium. The renewed attacks against sin and error in the other cities prove this.

Follow Paul on your map. Move that large-headed pin each week as you journey with him. Commit to memory the names of all the places visited and learn much about each city and the customs of those days.

At Lystra Paul wrought a miracle, though it was not done to draw attention to himself as was the result. Luke, the physician, is the writer of Acts and the Greek shows exactness of description such as a doctor would give in making the record. Orthopedic surgery was unknown in that day, but more wonderful results could be accomplished by the immediate work of the Great Physician. At the command "Stand upright on thy feet," the man who had never walked was able to leap up. It is inspiring to note the wonderful way in which God works.

IT SURELY was not Paul's fault that he was misunderstood by the Jupiter-Mercury worshipping people of Lystra as they cried out with wonder, in their local speech, and talked about gods when the only true God was manifesting His omnipotence. In their ignorance, the people of Lystra lost their supreme opportunity. Not so with Paul. His head was not turned by the applause. He had a mission and he held to "this one thing I do."

However much he might offend his hosts, or even endanger his own life, he forbade the priests to slay the oxen which were brought as a sacrifice to the two preachers. Then the one who was likened to Mercury made another address as he continued to turn them "from these vain things unto a living God." He directed their attention to the known in natural theology, as he told them about "the heaven, the earth and the sea and all that in them is." Then he sought to direct their attention to the Unknown as he proclaimed revealed theology—even the Creator who would enter into personal, helpful relationship with each one of them.

Stones became the applause and reward of such witnessing. Those who opposed Paul in Antioch were so mad that they were ready to journey 100 miles in order to wreak further vengeance on this man who had told them they were sinners. They also came from Iconium and stirred up the already aroused people of Lystra. And now they could go to their respective homes in peace, for Paul was stoned to death, as they thought. It is God's thought and not man's that counts. This journey, with its witness-bearing, is not completed and there are three other great trips for this evangelist to the Gentiles.

The faithful followers do not desert their fallen friend. As they stand tearfully and prayerfully around the fallen body; they smile through their tears as they are permitted to help him arise and they go with him into the city. There must have been a wonderful thanksgiving prayer meeting that night in old Lystra. Now that Paul had this awful experience, he could meditate on the stoning of Stephen with a new vividness.

Timothy, that beloved spiritual son of Paul, had his home in Lystra, and was doubtless won by Paul on this first missionary journey. Do your own research work and build up your history of Timothy. Turn to the frequently mentioned Bible dictionary, the concordance and marginal references, and look up all you can find about one who joined Paul on his second journey (Acts 16:1-3). Finding others and placing them in service is always the work of pastors, teachers and Christian workers. Timothy was not appalled by the prospect of hardship in connection with his stewardship as a witness.

THIS is a mid-summer lesson. The vacation season and the heat may be a real testing. Some have been known to omit kneeling in prayer before roommates, to leave their Bible in the suitcase, to omit church-going, etc. in the summertime. Others make their vacation a real missionary journey and add to their pleasure immensely while so doing. Souls can be won in August as well as during the week of prayer in January. The safety of your own soul may depend on the spiritual service you will undertake. Just make that minister or Sunday-school superintendent in the country, or at the seashore, glad that you are summering there.

The longest way round was Paul's way home. He might have made a short, quick journey overland from Derbe, where he went after leaving Lystra, to Antioch in Syria. Instead of "playing safe" after his rough experiences of the recent weeks, he went back to Lystra, Iconium and Antioch in Pisidia, whence he had been forced to flee and had even been stoned almost to death. Paul did more than start things. He knew that young converts need the most attention. To the limit of his time he would be a faithful pastor, so he returns to instruct further those who had found Christ through his preaching.

What attention is being paid to that splendid group of young people who made public profession of their faith a few months ago? The pastor held a communicants' class before they united with the church. What instructions are they regularly receiving now? Are you sure that each one is placed in the life of the church, where the best service can be rendered? It is the business of some one to know whether they are taking root downward and bearing fruit upward?

This first missionary journey concluded with a report to the church in Antioch, where they were sent forth by the Holy Spirit. We thank God that the missionaries have their furloughs and can report to the home church the work in which all are participants. History keeps repeating itself as the modern Acts of the Apostles is continuously being written by you and others.

when I went back to the lake and there was Mr. Diver still working around his big circle. I don't know whether he had stopped to eat or not.

KENT came home from the city on the five o'clock Interurban just in time to see the diver quit work for the day.

"Shall I come back tomorrow?" we heard him ask Mr. Persmann.

"Not unless you can do a lot better than you did today," said Persmann.

"I could bring the thing up in two minutes if you could show me just where you sank it," said the diver, "but it takes time to comb all over this lake."

"Yes and at ten dollars an hour it's mighty expensive time, too," said Persmann. "I don't believe you need come back. I'm going to try a drag."

"You'll need a drag like a fine-tooth comb to pick up a satchel from this maddy bottom," said the diver. "But it ain't my satchel."

"So they haven't found a thing?" said Kent. "I was awfully curious to know how they'd come out."

"Not a thing," I told him. "How about Harold?"

"I saw him safely started and he's an awfully grateful boy about that money. You know I used to think he was kind of a sissy, but the way he acts about his sister and everything, I like him."

"So do I," said I. "Next to you I like him better than any fellow I know."

"I had something else happen while I was in town today. I met Mr. Blair, the president of the company where Persmann works, and dad used to, too."

"Did he know you?" asked Kate.

"Oh, yes; spoke to me first. You know he offered me a job in the office for the summer a month or two ago."

"Yes, I know. And father wouldn't let you take it."

"Well, he offered me the same job again today."

"Did you tell him father wouldn't agree?"

"No. I just said, 'Mr. Blair, how can I go to work for a company that believes my father to be a thief?'"

"Was he mad?"

"No. He seemed a little inclined to laugh. He said, 'How did you get that idea? Nobody in our house believes your father to be a thief. We think it unfortunate that he can't prove his disposition of that package, but we don't have the faintest idea that he was dishonest. So if that's all your objection you'd better come to work tomorrow!'"

"Do you want to go?"

"I'd like to. We all need the money. But if father wouldn't let me take the job before, probably he won't now. I'm going to ask him though."

Strangely enough Mr. Bassel now made no objection.

"You'll need the money to buy clothes, Kent," said he. "I expect you to start school again in September. A few weeks' pay will be very helpful."

BUT I had work to start myself the next morning—picking up and sacking potatoes on Mr. Naylor's farm, and, believe me, it was work. When I quit that first night Mr. Naylor paid me three dollars. There are two hundred bones in the human body. Every one of mine ached. I reckoned it amounted to about a cent and a half an ache for each one of them.

Persmann had been poking around the lake all day with a drag, but he found no trace of his satchel. The officers of the club had stopped him from using a big dragnet, as he had planned to do. They said it would spoil the fishing, and intimated that they were by no means sure that Mr. Persmann had lost anything in that lake.

I was almost too tired and sleepy to be interested. Even Kent's adventures at the office could hardly keep me awake. But next morning I got up as fresh as ever and ready for another day chasing the elusive potato.

I kept that potato job until the work was all done and earned fifteen dollars, my very own money.

The search of the lake for the lost satchel had not been dropped by any means. Kent got me out of bed early every morning so that he might try half an hour's diving before he went to the city. Each day he was disappointed, but he always went at it the next.

Our diving was done so early in the morning that very few saw us or guessed what we were doing, but Mr. Persmann haunted the lake in the vicinity of the south end of the island all day long, day after day. He came down at earliest daylight and did not leave until dark, eating nothing but a few crackers that he bought at the club-house. He acted very strangely and did some very strange things. His own efforts were all failures, yet he was very jealous of anyone who attempted the slightest enterprise of any kind in that part of the lake.

Mr. Persmann looked queer and ill. Always thin and stooped, he was now becoming positively gaunt. He muttered to himself and made strange gestures that might have been meant for incantations. So strangely did he carry on that some of the club people began to question his sanity, and talked of having a lunacy commission to examine him.

THE evening that my potato job was finished, just a week after the loss of the satchel, I was coming home with my pay in my pocket, feeling quite important, just as he was leaving the lake after another day of failure. He acted so strangely that I followed to see where he would go, for instead of taking the road to his own cottage he went off towards the woods.

As he walked he muttered to himself, and instead of picking his way he seemed quite regardless of any path, trampling through underbrush and frequently knocking against trees.

At last he walked into a heavy, overhanging branch with such force that it not only knocked off his hat but cut his forehead enough to make it bleed.

"That's right," he shouted out aloud. "Even the trees are down on me. What do I care? All the world is down on me! What do I care?"

Instead of wiping the blood from his face he savagely knocked his head against the tree, not once only, but several times, as if there were a real satisfaction in the cruel contact.

I was really afraid of him, and perhaps that is the reason that I climbed a tree before I said a word. My two months in the woods had made me a good climber and I was up among the branches in a few seconds. Looking down I could see him beneath me, still acting wildly.

Did you ever think that you hated, despised and loathed a person more than anyone else in the world and just long for an opportunity to get even with him? And did you ever reach the place where you saw that person weak and pitiable and getting the worst end of everything, and suddenly find your hate melted to pity?

That's the way I was with Persmann. What I ought to have shouted down to Persmann from my shelter in the trees was, "This serves you right, Persmann; you are getting what you deserve."

And what I really did say as I looked down at that broken wreck of a man with his blood-stained, tear-stained face was, "Don't do that, Mr. Persmann. All you need's a friend. I can tell you of one."

He looked around on every side and then up into the branches.

"Did some one speak to me of a friend?" he asked. "Or am I hearing voices as well as seeing things?"

"I'm up here," I explained. "In these branches. Almost over you."

He glared up into the tree.

"Oh, it's you!" he said. "You're the boy who's always interfering in my business, the boy who stays at Bassel's. Do you think Major Bassel would be my friend?"

"He would if you wanted him, and were square with him," I asserted. "He doesn't hold grudges, even though he has a right."

"Come down here and let me tell you a few things," said Persmann. "I've got to tell 'em to some one. Come and sit down on this log."

Millions brush teeth in this new way. Leading dentists everywhere advise it. Half the world over it is bringing whiter, cleaner teeth. See what it brings to you.

The war on film

Dental science has found ways to fight the film on teeth. Film is that viscous coat you feel. It clings to teeth, gets between the teeth and stays.

It dims the teeth, clouds their beauty, causes most tooth troubles. And no tooth paste, until lately, could effectively combat it.

Film absorbs stains, making the teeth look dingy. It is the basis of tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Germes breed by millions in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea. Also of other diseases.

Now we combat it

Now we have ways to combat it. Able authorities have proved them by many careful tests. Modern dentists urge their daily use.

Both are embodied in a dentifrice called Pepsodent—a scientific tooth paste. And other factors are used with them to bring five desired effects.

Watch the change in a week

Make this free test and watch how your teeth improve. In a week you will gain a new idea in teeth cleaning.

Pepsodent acts in five ways, including film removal. It multiplies the salivary flow—Nature's great tooth protecting agent. It multiplies the starch digestant in the saliva, to digest starch deposits that cling. It multiplies the alkalinity of the saliva, to neutralize the acids which cause decay.

These things are essential.

Send the coupon for a 10-Day Tube. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the viscous film. See how teeth whiten as the film-coats disappear.

Rev. Zed H. Copp, 1003 Duncannon Ave., Philadelphia, writes: "While I am not an old minister, I am at present without a pastorate, having recently resigned as chaplain of the Eastern Penitentiary, and would be glad to serve my Master and His people anywhere He may want me. Of course, I would prefer a down-town church in a large city, doing institutional work, or a country church near a large city. The Lord's will be done. I await His orders."

E. de L., Ceylon, writes: "Having read in the Christian Herald that all Christians are urged to unite with the members of the League in daily prayer at the noon hour, also that any one is at liberty to send requests, I would ask the members to pray that our Almighty Father grant me my heart's desire and give back my brother's full memory, which he lost through a severe attack of fever."

Young People's Topics for August 14

By REV. RICHARD BRAUNSTEIN

True Temperance in Heart and Life

C. E. and B. Y. P. U. I Thess. 5: 4-11

PAUL is writing to the brethren of the church at Thessalonica and he says, "Therefore let us not sleep as do others, but let us watch and be sober." In Crabb's Synonyms we read that the word "sober" means "grave" and the word "grave" expresses a weight in the intellectual operations which makes them proceed slowly. Sobriety is therefore a more natural and ordinary state for the human mind than "gravity."

It behooves every person to be "sober" in all situations, but those who fill the most important stations of life must be "grave." Even in our pleasures we may observe "sobriety" which keeps us from any excessive ebullition of mirth but on particular occasions where the importance of the subject ought to weigh on the mind it becomes us to be "grave." At a feast we have need of "sobriety." At a funeral we have need of "gravity." "Sobriety" extends to many more objects than "gravity." We must be "sober" in our judgments, thoughts, opinions, as well as our outward conduct and behavior, but we can be "grave," properly speaking, only in our looks and our outward deportment.

For other interesting studies see the meaning of the words "temperance," "modesty" and "humility." They are all related and the Christian life is related to them all. Unless we have these words in our vocabulary and their definitions in our minds, the values and ideals for which they are but the symbols, will not be manifested by the prompting of the heart and the action of the life.

My Favorite Saying of Christ and Why

E. L. John 6: 63-68; Matt. 7: 24, 25

WE REMEMBER the words of David Livingstone concerning the promise of Jesus: "I am with you always." They are the words of a gentleman. He will not go back on them. That's all there is to it. To the great African explorer and missionary the words of Jesus were final. They are final to those who believe them and obey them, and make them a personal possession. Note the topic speaks in terms of personal possession by beginning with the personal pronoun "MY."

How many words of Jesus are yours? The more we appropriate of them the richer we shall be. All of the sayings of Jesus we may well make our favorites. They are the words of life.

In the philosophy of the Son of God there is a teaching for every purpose of life. There is a guidance for every issue and crisis. There is a solution for every puzzle and an answer to every question. By way of illustration:

Once there was a soldier who started out on a journey for his king. His king was a very wise and good man and gave his soldier a box which contained a great many pairs of wings. Each pair of wings had a label. One said "When attacked by robbers." When attacked by robbers all the soldier had to do was to attach the wings on his shoes and away he flew and escaped his enemies. Another was labeled "For the darkness." When it was too dark to see how to go, he put the wings on and they led him to the light. The sayings of Jesus are our "wings" and they help us along the pilgrim path of life.

Federal Farm Loan Bonds

IT IS easier to earn money than it is to save money. Certainly it requires strength of character as well as sound judgment to invest money wisely. There are so many temptations to spend "just this once," and so many lures to invest in speculative ventures.

Yet the process of saving and investing is simple, and the result certain, if the family goes about it in the right way. An expense and saving budget with a definite system of investing are all that are necessary.

Your budget need not be complex. Classification of expenses and savings may be made along the following lines with such amplifications as may meet the needs of the particular family. Except in extreme misfortune, the budget should be strictly adhered to—therein lies the secret of successful accumulation.

A big income is not essential to systematic saving. One couple, who started life with nothing but sound character and a willingness to work and save, raised and educated four children, built and paid for a substantial home, and provided amply for their sunset years—all out of a moderate salary, because they followed religiously their budget system throughout their fifty odd years of married life, and put each year's savings in proven investments.

They purchased farm mortgages and life insurance. They were frequently tempted to speculate in real estate and just once bought several residence lots in an attractive location. But it was found when the lots were finally sold and the expenses deducted that larger returns would have been received by sticking entirely to farm mortgages.

This couple have passed from earthly scenes, but if these people were here, they would doubtless be systematic investors in Federal Farm Loan Bonds. Federal Farm Loan Bonds are the direct descendants of the old-fashioned farm mortgage which has for generations been the favorite security of careful investors.

A FEDERAL Farm Loan Bond is an engraved certificate representing a little piece of hundreds of massed first mortgages on approved farms scattered over the States comprising one of the twelve Federal Land Bank Districts. It is guaranteed not only by the issuing Land Bank but also jointly by all the twelve Federal Land Banks with combined capital exceeding $24,000,000.

The value of the mortgages represented by Federal Farm Loan Bonds never exceed 50 per cent. of the appraised value of the farms against which they are issued. And in the case of farms with buildings, the value of the mortgages must not exceed 50 per cent. of the value of the bare land plus 20 per cent. of the value of the improvements. Further, these farms must be cultivated by their owners. The appraisals are made by experts employed by the Federal Farm Loan Board, a division of the United States Treasury Department.

Federal Farm Loan Mortgages are of the "disappearing" or amortized type. A fixed sum is paid at each interest date so that the principal is steadily reduced, disappearing entirely with the last interest payment at the end of 35 years, or sooner, at the option of the borrower. For this reason the security behind a Federal Farm Loan Bond is constantly growing stronger.

Then, too, a single farmer might through misfortune—fire, drought, flood or insect devastation—be unable to meet his interest when due. But the interest payments on Federal Farm Loan Bonds are guaranteed by the pledge of the capital stock of all the Federal Land Banks.

Federal Farm Loan Bonds are tax-exempt. This is an important point, for in many states mortgages and other securities are taxed. The income from Federal Farm Loan Bonds is also exempt from income tax, whether Federal or State.

They Furnish a Safe Investment of the Most Desirable Type

By H. H. CHARLES

in most parts of the country. Besides these Bonds begin earning interest from the day you buy them. And remember that this rate is absolutely net—there are no deductions or fees whatever. You will receive your check promptly on due date, if you select registered bonds, or you may cash your coupon at your local bank, if you prefer the coupon form.

BECAUSE Federal Farm Loan Bonds are nationally known as a gilt-edge security, they are accepted by all bankers as desirable collateral security.

The use of collateral is becoming more and more common, even in small towns. Suppose you have five hundred dollars on hand which you will need only a short time during the entire year. You do not need to keep this money idle the year round so as to have the use of it when needed. A better plan is to invest it in a safe security. Then when money is needed, your banker will loan you about 80 per cent. of the value of the bonds, holding the bonds as security until the loan is paid. The interest you will pay the bank for 60 or 90 days will amount to far less than the interest you will receive from your bonds for the year.

Again, in selecting an investment, it should be kept in mind that circumstances may arise which make it necessary to turn the investment into cash. Here again, Federal Farm Loan Bonds have a distinct advantage over many types of safe investment. They are dealt in on all the great stock exchanges of the country, and can be quickly sold. Even during the recent financial depression 5 per cent Federal Farm Loan Bonds have sold close to their par value.

But there are other purely business reasons why Christian Herald readers should be interested in Federal Farm Loan Bonds. Money invested in these securities is used to upbuild rural communities, to help over-burdened farmers to get out of debt and to help ambitious tenant farmers to realize their life dream of actual farm ownership.

The Federal Farm Loan System was established by Act of Congress in 1916 and the Act has been fully upheld by a recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. This system is a great co-operative institution doing for country people what the building and loan associations are doing for city people—promoting thrift, prosperity and good citizenship.

Federal Farm Loan Bonds can be obtained from any Federal Land Bank in denominations ranging all the way from $40 up to $5,000. There are twelve of these banks, each serving a group of States. You can locate on the map the Federal Land Bank serving your State.

Redeeming the Convict

THE Prisoners' Relief Society started its work only seven years ago, but during that time it has helped, directly and indirectly, to a better life, 56,870 men and women, who have served prison sentences. The Society has received from all sources $70,000 and the money has been spent in these proportions: For clerks and attendants, 25 per cent.; executive salaries, 10 per cent.; feeding, lodging and clothing, 23 per cent.; postage, 27 per cent.; equipment, 5 per cent.; stationery, 6 per cent.; publicity, 4 per cent.

Since ninety per cent. of these 56,870 convicts, taken at random, have stood the test in seven years, what more is to be said, but that the experiment has been worth trying and that the business men who have taken the risk have done a good deed? The Prisoners' Relief Society was founded by E. E. Dudding, himself an ex-convict. Its headquarters are at 509 E. Street, N.W., Washington, D. C.

Federal Farm Loan Bonds yield 5 percent interest. This rate, while moderate, is considerably higher than that paid by savings institutions

"Anybody can do it if he has Henry Wilkinson's patience and persistence," said Mr. Pickering.

How Henry Wilkinson Became Rich

Although never favored by fortune, Henry Wilkinson died well off. The small sums he was able to save never would have amounted to much but for a discovery Henry made of the power of compound interest. By a simple but unsuspected method Henry Wilkinson doubled his money and doubled it again.

Henry Wilkinson's system is not a secret. It has nothing to do with speculation. There is nothing left to chance or luck. It is a sound plan of investment which you or anyone else can follow.

Questions and Answers

R. M. S., Portland, Ore. The conscience of the world must be touched and touched strongly before war can be made to appear in its true character as a resort to savagery—to brute force, plus all the destructive aids which misdirected science can devise for multiplying slaughter and destruction. During these last seven years the inventive genius of man has been almost wholly diverted from legitimate tasks of helpfulness and given over to spreading death and desolation. When the world conscience is aroused, war and all the preparatory steps that lead to it, will stand revealed as utterly abhorrent.

W. H. H., Versailles, Mo. The best rejoinder to your letter is the official announcement of the invitation to a conference on reducing armaments, which the President has issued and which promises to be acceptable to the great nations. There can be no world readjustment while high pressure keeps on making armies and navies bigger and bigger, and also keeps adding to the burden of taxation. The situation is more hopeful than it has been in many months, and shows that our confidence that the United States would yet do its full share in world readjustment was fully justified. We repeat the advice that it would be well to await developments. If you have read the Christian Herald editorials, you must be familiar with the attitude of the paper on this whole question.

W. M., Gwinner, N. D. 1. Some translators make the commandment read: "Thou shalt do no murder," obviously referring to the wanton taking of human life. 2. There are sports and amusements that are clean and wholesome, and some that are mixed up with gambling and other objectionable features. When conscience interposes a doubt as to their advisability, the wisest plan is to let them alone.

Mrs. J. G. C., San Francisco, Calif. This much-discussed passage (Matt. 16:19) has been strained in the interpretation to uphold the claim of Peter's supreme spiritual primacy; but in all the New Testament there is nowhere the slightest trace of any authority being given to Peter which was not given to and exercised by all the disciples alike. For confirmation of this see Matt. 18:18 to 23.

Mrs. E. R. T., Ossining, N. Y. The passage in Colossians 1:15 (see also Heb. 1:6) implies priority and superlative dignity. The phrase has also been translated: "begotten before every creature," or "the first-born of all creation." Even before the incarnation, He was the image of the invisible God as the Word by whom God created the worlds, and by whom also God manifested Himself to the patriarchs.

A. M. P., Elko, N. Y. 1. We have the assurance that God will honor those who honor Him. How, then, can we expect to receive this blessing, if we dishonor His holy day and give it over to worldliness and pleasure? 2. We must expect that those who follow the Christian life will meet with opposition from worldly people. 3. With regard to your other question, you should endeavor to reach a mutual understanding. If he be a true Christian, he will not put any stumbling block in your way. Every one of us has faults, and even in Christian work, there are methods that it might be well to amend, for the work's sake.

C. H. W., Batesville, Ind., writes: "I am only one of thousands who are raising their voices in protest against such exhibitions of the 'boxing art' as that which recently took place in New Jersey. What right have we as a Christian nation to allow such exhibitions in these United States? 'In God We Trust' is engraved on the very coin that was exchanged for admittance, and on the vast sums spent on the betting. And not only that, but these feats of brutality will from now on be shown in all of the movies in the land. What a lesson for our youth! What good will all of our talking and the preachers' preaching do, when the news press devotes page upon page to such events."

L. B. J., El Paso, Tex., has a kindly word to say in behalf of the aged minister. He writes: "Although not myself a minister, but a member of the Church and a believer, I want to say in relation to the aged ministers: I was converted when about 17 years old and started upon life's battlefield; and I thank God for the blessed opportunities I have had to listen to preachers who have been on the field many years before I knew them. They have been a help to me such as words can not express. Their experience has put me on the lookout for the enemy in ambush and helped me to overcome. We should pray also that God may bless the young pastors, but do not let us put the aged saint in the background. The story of Jesus is thousands of years old; yet it is ever new, and is most sweetly told by those who have lived a long Christian life, with Jesus by their side on the battlefield. The presence of the aged ministers is a blessing from God to us, and we should care for them and love them until He takes them home."

Mrs. H. A. L., Orange, Calif. There is a strong and we believe a growing desire to restore the use of the Bible in our public schools. The opposition is powerful, and there are many elements in our population that bitterly oppose it. Meanwhile, our churches and Sunday schools must do all in their power to popularize Bible study among the young. More important than all other means is the restoration of the Family Altar in American homes, where the children will be brought into daily contact with the Word. Such an influence lasts through life. We are apt to seek for remedies at a distance when they lie near at hand. If every family had Bible reading and worship daily, the true remedy would be attained, and there would be no danger of the next generation growing up in ignorance of the Divine message as a guide to the life that now is and that which is to come.

J. L., Chicago, Ill., sends this interesting note: "Dr. Burrell in his truly excellent sermon, 'Living for Eternity,' published in the Christian Herald for July 8, 1921, states: 'If Augustine had not gone to Britain as the pursuivant of Foreign Missions, you would still be out with a club after provender and a wife, as your ancestors were.' The first Roman missionaries arrived in Britain under the leadership of Augustine in 597. But ages before this brave toiler for Christ saw the light of day, the labors of men who had a consuming passion for Foreign Missions, resulted in the early British Church. Green, in the opening chapter of his 'Short History of the English People,' tells us that the Roman Church in Kent shrunk into inactivity before the heathen reaction; that its place in the conversion of England was taken by missionaries from Ireland; that Patrick, the first missionary of the island, had not been half a century dead when Irish Christianity flung itself with a fiery zeal into battle with the mass of heathenism which was rolling in upon the Christian world; that for a time it seemed as if the course of the world's history was to be changed, as if Celtic and not Latin Christianity was to mould the destinies of the Churches of the West."

J. M. S., Mount Joy, Pa. The whole "Irish question" is now under discussion with a view to an amicable adjustment, if such can be reached.

D. F. W., Osceola, Neb. Secret organizations such as those we know today are not discussed in the Bible, for they were apparently unknown in Bible times. It is quite probable however, that there were, even before the New Testament was written, organizations of various kinds, patriotic, professional and otherwise, but we of today have no definite knowledge of their general character or purpose, so we can not even compare them with modern secret bodies. The latter should not be judged offhand on hearsay. There may be good and bad among them, especially in the Masonic orders, the Odd Fellows, Foresters, etc. We are distinctly told in the Scripture that God, the Searcher of hearts, is the only Judge. See Matt. 7:1-5, Rom. 14:4, and other passages.

Skid Shocked!

THE nerve-racking skid leaves its mark upon those who realize its menace.

The insistent memory of the helpless slithering towards a danger point often spoils all future enjoyment of a motor car.

The treachery of chainless tires defeats the best efforts of the most expert and careful driver to prevent skidding, or to bring a car to a sudden stop, on wet pavements or muddy roads.

Helping with Farm Home Problems

IN MINNESOTA last fall the county home demonstration agent, working under the Department of Agriculture and the Minnesota State College of Agriculture, was busily engaged in assisting the county project leader to check up results of the recent clothing school when a fresh, handsome, and much-tanned young woman with six children came breezily into the room. The purpose of her visit was to ask for instructions for preparing veal pot-pie in the new pressure cooker recently added to her kitchen equipment at the suggestion of the home demonstration agent, to save labor and time in preparing meals for her large family.

"I will have to hurry," she explained smilingly, "you see we have threshers, twenty-eight of them, today and they certainly have fine appetites this busy season."

The group of children, dressed plainly but neatly, all barefooted and bareheaded, would have attracted attention anywhere. It was evident that soap, water, and sunshine were in constant use in that family, but it was the splendid health, beauty, and poise of the mother which held the eye.

In a corner of the office the children spied the scales used in the recent health campaign in which the home demonstration agent had a part. They demanded to be weighed and measured and vehemently reported that they were following the nutrition specialist's advice and were drinking three glasses of milk every day. They all weighed up to standard, and their physical condition was recorded as "prime." The mother said three older children at home were doing the dinner dishes and starting supper. She was only 33 years old and looked about 25.

"Being the happiest of women, the harder I work the happier I am," she said. "Each child makes me feel I must fill a bigger place in the world. This year, because of the shortage of help, I have had to work in the fields, as the grain seemed to ripen all at once, but I enjoyed it, for the work went well in the house. My girls are clippers to work."

Stepping lightly as a girl, she gathered her brood together and loaded them into the car. The big machine swung down the road under her capable hands toward the country home where that American family is growing up with the best of food, the purest of air, and ideal surroundings.

IF EVERY farm home held a mother like this amazing Minnesota woman, with nine children, and if economic and educational conditions were satisfactory in every State in the union, there would be little need for attention to the farm family problems on the part of the United States Department of Agriculture. Unfortunately, factors that are quite outside of the control of individuals affect rural conditions, and many of them make life and work on the farm far more difficult and discouraging than it need be.

It has been realized for some years that before agriculture and rural life can reach its highest development, the farm home and the rural community must be made as efficient, as attractive, and as satisfying to the whole family as the farm is to the farmer. This calls for better rural schools, better roads, better health facilities, more modern conveniences in the home, more attention to home beautification, and more time for play, for social life, and hospitality among rural people.

Help in the farm home is rare and exceedingly difficult to obtain. If the farm woman is to take her part in the social and civic life of her family and the community in which she lives, her work and the conditions surrounding the home must be so adjusted as to make this possible.

It would be difficult to select any single project, and say, "This is something entirely new that is going to be done by the United States Department of Agriculture for the farm home." Work which appears to be new today may be only a small part of a large general improvement project. For example, the making of gummed paper dress-forms in communities where groups of women are interested in garment-making has attracted wide attention, both because of interest in the article itself, and because of a certain amount of questioning, largely traceable to masculine sources, as to the connection between dress forms and agriculture proper. But this particular activity is merely a detail in clothing conservation work, which in turn is a detail in general home efficiency. It has been found that because sewing consumed so much time, especially when the home dressmaker was unskilled, other home needs were pushed to one side. The effort of the department is to round out the entire family life into a harmonious whole.

ONE need reveals another; often the results accomplished by one bureau open up the way for another to step in and provide some helpful plan. The canning clubs which were developed from very small beginnings, by the club workers in the States Relations Service, indicated the necessity for absolute cleanliness, for screens, the great need of running water, and more conveniently arranged kitchens; so the Office of Rural Engineering concentrated on house plans and ways of installing a water supply. It made many contributions toward the improvement of sanitary conditions in and about the rural home. Under preparation are new bulletins on the best methods of sewage disposal, and on the construction of chimneys.

What seems urgently wanted one season may be gradually superseded by an entirely different set of conditions. Different sections of the country have different needs.

Thus, at the present time, those who carry on extension work in the fifteen Southern States report everywhere an acute demand for instruction and help which will enable farm women to increase the cash income of the home. The club work in the South, therefore, among women and girls, is directed toward the development of home industries and the utilization of local materials to make salable articles. There is a good sale for these products, especially in States frequented by tourists.

In the Northern, and particularly the large, sparsely settled Western States, there are comfortable farms, sufficiently self-supporting individually, but there is no market within access of the individual home where anything offered for sale would be bought. There is a money shortage due to general agricultural conditions, and the farmers' wives are far more concerned with the possibility of utilizing what they have, so that little money need be spent, than with their chances of bringing in cash. The greatest present demand in the North and West is to learn how to make old clothes do, in view of the prevailing high prices for women's garments.

THE aim of the United States Department of Agriculture has been to consider the farmer's wife as a partner in the business of farming, and to further the interests of the home in every way possible as a part of its general agricultural assistance. Viewed in this way, there is hardly a bureau or an office in the department where the work does not affect the problems of rural women and children directly or indirectly. Take the work of the Bureau of Public Roads, which administers the Federal-Aid Road Act. The more good roads, the less isolation; the better trip to market, to schools, to community gatherings; the gradual increase in contact with inspiring people and activities—while the independence of the farm home life remains undisturbed.

The Bureau of Chemistry touches every pantry in the land, through the administration of the Federal Food and Drugs Act. Protection from misbranded or adulterated foods is as valuable to the rural as to the city housewife. And since the diversified stocks of the city grocer are not possible to the country storekeeper, it is doubly necessary for the rural housewife to be protected, in connection with Food and Drugs control, from food packages which are misleading in appearance or fraudulently packed.

Most of the meat should be raised on the farms, but a certain amount is often bought. The farm family, like all other consumers, needs protection from diseased animals or meat that is otherwise unfit for consumption. Meat inspection is done by the Bureau of Animal Industry, which maintains a large staff of inspectors in every establishment shipping meat in interstate commerce. This control affects not only fresh meats, but also cured products and such articles as sausages or canned mixtures made from meat.

The Dairy Division in the Bureau of Animal Industry disseminates information on the best and most sanitary methods for making butter, cheese, and ice-cream, and is concerned particularly with the increased consumption of milk on the farm. It is astonishing to learn that in spite of the facilities for obtaining good food on most farms, there are many under-nourished rural children. One reason for this is a lack of knowledge among farm people of the real value of milk and milk products in the diet of their own families.

A project for the coming year in the Dairy Division is a series of educational milk campaigns in the country districts to meet this need. Several states co-operating with the Dairy Division have done splendid work in encouraging the use of milk in cities.

EXPERIMENTAL work in the digestibility of various foods is carried on by the Office of Home Economics, States Relations Service, from which the results are disseminated either through printed matter or extension workers. It would be difficult to point out any single new project, for scientific studies of this kind are going on all the time.

The average farm family, it has been learned by the investigations of nutrition specialists, enjoys an abundant and wholesome diet, but the general tendency is to eat fewer green vegetables and fruits, less milk and fewer eggs than the best knowledge of nutrition indicates to be needed. Particular emphasis has been placed on the proper food for growing children. The hot school lunch has been established by the home demonstration agents as widely as possible, to demonstrate many dietary lessons through the children,

The home demonstration agent watches the local leader in an egg circle lesson as well as to improve the health of the children in a specific way by making sure they receive nourishing food at noon.

Children who learn to select and prepare a suitable lunch in school have gained a knowledge of balanced diet as well as of cookery; old prejudices are abandoned, new and useful foods are tried, and more healthful methods of cooking are suggested. It is one thing to hand little Johnny or Mary a bulletin on "School Lunches" to take home to mother, but quite another to introduce Johnny and Mary to a new and delightful way of serving potatoes or apples, as the case may be, so that subsequent reading of literature on the subject is connected with pleasant personal experience.

The home demonstration agents, through whom the department co-operates with the various State colleges, carry information in home economics directly to the rural communities. Wherever it has been in operation home demonstration has proved to be the most helpful system of dealing with the problems of the farm home.

The hot school lunch is a great benefit to the children

THE principles of extension teaching today are quite different from those in vogue a decade or more ago. The original plan was for a lecturer to talk on a subject, selected by himself, to such audiences as could be induced to go to the place of the lecture. A limited number of people might thus be interested in what the lecturer had to say if his topic happened to suit their needs. The present method is for the extension worker to endeavor to learn, through the farm bureau or other county organizations, what the people of the various communities really want in the way of assistance and instruction.

A great deal has been said in the past to give the impression that while the farm woman's husband is ready to adopt labor-saving machinery and equipment for field and barn, he has been unwilling to see the need of conveniences for his wife's use. Home demonstration agents, who have spoken before mixed meetings, report that the contrary is often true; that the men are the ones to appreciate the practical value of labor-saving devices for the kitchen, to look into their cost, and to urge their conservative better halves to give the conveniences a trial. There is little cash in circulation on many farms, and the men usually handle it, so that the wives often show a curious diffidence about asking for money.

Extension help, however, would not get much farther than under the former system, if it had to be administered only by lectures, because the number of persons who can actually hear such instruction is necessarily limited. A further departure from the old way has, therefore, been in an application of the endless chain principle. The home demonstration agent teaches, but she gives her instruction to individuals and to groups of leaders in various selected communities. These leaders are usually chosen because of their successful work. When they have mastered the idea, the leaders gather groups in their own communities and discuss with them the information they have received. The home demonstration agent is assisted in subject matter and methods by extension specialists who have headquarters at the various colleges. It is then her business to guide and advise the local leaders as far as possible, and to conduct special demonstrations whenever she can. She forms the connecting channel through which the State agricultural college and the United States Department of Agriculture can deal directly with rural home makers.

THERE was so much food work done during the war that many other needs of the farm home were overshadowed. Over 75 per cent. of rural home-makers, it has been found, do a large part of their own sewing. The demand for any instruction that helps to shorten the time the farm woman spends on the family sewing, and for ways of reducing the clothing expenditures has been very widespread. Volunteer leaders in making and remodeling garments have been trained. There is a steady demand for millinery classes, and information about renovating clothes, particularly by dry cleaning.

The business side of housekeeping is receiving greater attention. Help in rearranging the entire house, or the kitchen, for greater efficiency, is frequently asked. The fact that the rural people of the United States are derived from many nationalities must be constantly kept in mind. Work in establishing the best American dietary habits can be considered real Americanization. Home nursing, preparation of food for the sick and convalescent, preventive hygiene, child feeding and care, are all parts of home-health projects directly affecting the welfare of the farm family.

In the thirty-three Northern and Western States, the boys' and girls' club work is conducted by especially trained men or women known as county club agents. These club agents are co-ordinate with the county agricultural agent and home demonstration agent in a county.

The organization of agricultural or home-making clubs is based on community problems. When the community decides on its major agricultural or home problems then the boys and girls are asked to assist in solving them. Some of the advanced clubs are working on nutrition, health and clothing demonstrations.

Glorious Mountains I Have Seen

A Delightful Travel Article

By REV. FRANCIS E. CLARK, D.D., LL.D.

MOUNTAINS figure largely in Biblical imagery. In the eyes of the Scripture writers, whether the mountains are large or small, they seem always to be "glorious." They are spoken of as "the everlasting hills," as "holy hills," as the "hill of the Lord," and the "strength of the hills" is declared to be His also.

In the so-called Traveller's Psalm, the writer would first of all lift his eyes unto the hills. Indeed, all through the Scriptures there is a literary and spiritual emphasis upon the mountains, which neither lakes nor rivers nor the ocean itself shares.

It makes one think of the sunrise glow from Rigi, or the afterglow on the Jungfrau; as though the sacred writers always obtained inspiration and uplift from the very thought of them. Strength, beauty, majesty, the glory of the morning, and the peaceful light of evening seems to rest upon their brows. Every devout soul, from Bible times to the present day, they point, as they did Coleridge, to God.

I do not wonder that the Brazilians call one of the great hills that hem in the magnificent harbor of Rio de Janeiro, and stretches its lone peak far up toward the clouds, "The Finger of God."

I find as much difficulty in deciding upon the most glorious mountains I have seen, as in settling upon the most beautiful cities, or most remarkable lakes.

Probably the majority of people who have seen it would say that Fujiyama in Japan stands at the head of its class; and who has not seen it—at least its picture? It is the best advertised mountain in the world. On ten million fans and ten times ten million advertisements, on tea-boxes and Japanese lanterns, on paper and canvas, on silk and lacquer, in oils and water colors, and black and white, one can seldom get far away from lovely, symmetrical Fuji.

It deserves all the advertising it gets. It is supremely beautiful, with its bare brown head surmounting its lovely green body in summer time, and it is equally glorious when it seems to have grown suddenly old, and white locks cover its hoary head in winter.

I have seen Fujiyama many times and from many angles, but never did it look so charming to me as it did on my first visit to Japan. While journeying thither after a week of sullen, threatening weather, a typhoon overtook us in the China Sea. All one night our staunch ship, the Peru, rolled and pitched, as though every wallow in the waves would be her last. Except for an hour, this awful heaving and tossing and straining kept up. During that one hour the Peru was in the comparatively calm center of the hurricane. During that hour, too, many seabirds, borne along by the typhoon, unable to get out on either side of the terrific storm, dropped down exhausted on the ship's deck.

After about sixty minutes the ship struck the outer edge of the circular storm. Then confusion was worse confounded. Passengers could not lie in their bunks but stretched out on the cabin floor, holding on as best they could.

At length the awful night was over, and with the night the worst of the hurricane. The sun broke through the murky clouds, and there, in the distance stretched the shores of Japan, and lovely Fuji, snow-crowned, loomed on the horizon, a sight good for sore eyes, if there ever was such a sight. No wonder pilgrims by the thousand climb Fujiyama's steep slopes every year, or that it is hallowed by religious sentiment, however far these sentiments may be from the worship of the true God.

BUT Japan has not the only wonderfully imposing and symmetrical mountain in the world. Singularly enough, on the opposite side of the Pacific, on our own shores, are mountains of the same general type and of about the same height, vast, solitary, towering cones, snow-crowned, and eternal. I refer to Hood and Rainier (forgive me, Tacomaites) and St. Helens. There are no more glorious hills to which we may lift up our eyes than this splendid trio.

Five thousand miles apart from their brother on the Japanese shore, they stand as though guarding America's strand, while Fujiyama guards Nippon.

These towering sentinels on either coast make one wonder if they do not belong to the same family and if many brother mountains are not submerged under the Pacific's waves? Perhaps as we cross the great channel between America and Asia, we sail over peaks as high and symmetrical as Mt. Hood or Mt. Fuji, without suspecting it. Only the fish see them and climb, with their fins instead of their legs, the steep cones.

May these guardians of our coasts always be peace-makers and not warriors—policemen if you will, but not soldiers.

Mt. Shasta, too, on our own Pacific Coast, is a mountain of another type than Hood and Rainier and St. Helens, and yet no less glorious in its way. It is more like the Swiss mountains than the others. With its vast bulk it seems to blot out the whole horizon beyond. As one travels north, from Sacramento to Oregon, up the rich Sacramento Valley, it begins to look upon our sight, like some majestic animal, stretched out at full length. It takes hours on an express train to get by its vast bulk, and, before it fades on one's vision, as the train rushes north, we have learned to love it, not as a menacing, but as a friendly, animal, like some huge shaggy watchdog.

Near by, too, is Mt. Lassen, the great volcano, so furious at times that it sends out volumes of smoke and fire that would seem to be enough to smother the universe. It would be as famous as Vesuvius if it were not in an almost inaccessible wilderness.

Mt. Rainier, 14,363 feet high, reflected in Mirror Lake

The Coast Range, the Olympics, the Sierras, are all glorious in their way, and so are the Rocky Mountains, though, from the eastern side, as we cross the continent their majesty is somewhat minified by the gradual ascent that leads up to them. We ascend a mile or more over an apparently level plain, without knowing it, and in our Pullman section we are a third of the way to the summit of Pike's Peak before we realize that we have climbed at all.

Lovers of the Canadian Rockies will tell us that there are no such glorious white hills in all the world as those jagged towering peaks among which and through which the Canadian Pacific Railway pushes its way from the prairies of Manitoba to the lesser mountains of British Columbia. I cannot disagree with them.

THE White Hills of New Hampshire will have their partisans too, who will contend that if you really wish to enjoy mountain scenery which isn't so tremendous as to be overwhelming and yet grand enough to be inspiring, you must go to Bethlehem or Crawford Notch. Evidently the proprietors of the hotel resorts in the White Mountains who charge from ten to thirty dollars a day believe this, and they also believe that for topnotch prices a six-thousand-foot hill is as good as a Mt. Everest with twenty-six thousand feet to its credit.

By way of contrast with such prices I am reminded of an outing trip which I took when a college boy fifty years ago, through these same White Mountains of New Hampshire. Half a dozen of us hired an old horse and a covered wagon which we loaded with certain staple provisions, an A tent, and an axe. One of the party drove the horse, while the rest walked, all taking their turns on the wagon-seat, at what was considered an unpleasant "chore" as compared with walking. Every night we set up our tent, chopped our own firewood from the dead logs, caught our own trout, fried our own bacon and lived like kings for two weeks, at a total cost of fifteen dollars, about one-half of what many nabobs spend among those same hills in a single day.

Yet the mountains are just as grand, the pines and spruces as entrancing, the purling brooks as lovely, and the resulting health ten times as great, as when these same delights of nature are viewed through the plate-glass windows of a thirty-dollar-a-day-suite.

We must not forget the glories of the Swiss mountains, while dilating upon our own. What would Switzerland be without her hills? In a sense they have made her the sturdy, rugged, little republic that she is. She is a peaceful island in the midst of the seething, crashing billows of Europe. In many respects she is the model republic of the world. I believe that the granite of her hills has somehow gotten into the sinews and the blood of her people, and has made a nation

The Crescent Wanes in the Philippines

UNCLE SAM is a wonder-worker. He makes a population of starved, oppressed white men and black into a prosperous little Cuban republic. He takes a scattered archipelago of many tongues and races, of Christians, Mohammedans and pagans, to form a unified Filipino nationality with a Christian culture and an efficient, up-to-date democratic government.

He has formulated and demonstrated the basic principle upon which any permanent peace in this world must be founded. Through twenty years of administration in the Philippines he has proven that democratic self-government can be taught to tropical, oriental peoples with skins that are not white. In fact, he has done more than this with the Christian Filipinos who, fortunately, had the advantage of three hundred years of contact with European government and Christian civilization. He has given to them the American's tremendous faith in democracy and a missionary zeal for Christian culture. Today, Filipino teachers, doctors, preachers, engineers and administrators are carrying the torch of enlightenment and the blessings of peace to the pagan tribes of the mountains and to the once fanatical Mohammedans of Mindanao and Sulu.

History does repeat itself. The Protestant revolt caused by the decay of medieval Catholicism in the sixteenth century, was in turn a cause of the Catholic revival which spread the teachings and organization of the Roman Church into the two Americas, the Philippines, much of the East Indies and even into China and Japan by the end of the seventeenth century.

In like manner but on a very small scale, the Filipino revolution of 1896, which was a revolt against the Spanish friars rather than against the Spanish government, precipitated a schism in the Philippine Catholic Church and induced a rise of Protestantism in the archipelago which, though remarkable in itself, is doubly so because of its beneficial effect upon Philippine Catholicism. The rapid spread of Protestantism in the Philippines made it easier for the American bishops to insist on higher spiritual and moral standards among the Filipino clergy and to eliminate those priests who did not measure up to the intellectual, moral and spiritual standards set by American prelates.

ONE effect of this spiritual reform, both Protestant and Catholic, among the Filipinos has very great significance because of its relation to the problem of Filipinizing the Moros of Mindanao and Sulu. In fact it marks an epoch in the conflict between Mohammedanism and Christianity. When Magellan reached the Philippine Islands in 1521 he found the old enemies of Christianity, the Mohammedans, ahead of him.

The Crescent of Mahomet spreading westward from Mecca was checked first at Tours by the Franks under Karl Martel in 732, and finally at Vienna by the Poles under John Sobieski in 1683. The rise of the Spanish nation up to 1492 was largely a story of the fight between the Cross and the Crescent for the body and soul of the Spanish peninsula. And strange it is that the Conquest of Granada, which broke the last hold of Mohammedanism on Western Europe, occurred in the same year as the discovery of America.

The discovery of America began that second advance of Christianity toward the west which was destined to block the way of Mahomet in the east just as the Conquest of Granada had blocked it in the west. It was only twenty-nine years after the fall of the Kingdom of Granada and only twenty years after the expulsion of the Moors from Spain that the Spanish friars sailing to the Philippines with the Great Navigator found themselves again face to face with their old enemies, the Moslems. Naturally,

Christianity Rapidly Is Spreading Now in the Southern Islands, which Have Been Moslem for Centuries

they gave these oriental Moslems the same name, Moros, which they applied to the hated Moors back in Spain.

Mohammedanism spreading eastward crossed India and Malaysia, then turned northward through Borneo and established itself firmly in the southern islands of the Philippine archipelago. It was already stretching out long arms to the north in 1570 when the Spanish colonizer, Legaspi, captured the native city at Manila from Lacondola, a Mohammedan sultan, who had established the Moslem Crescent in this northern island only a few years before. The aggressiveness of the Spanish conquerors and the fiery zeal of the Spanish priests stemmed this advancing tide of Mohammedanism and made Christians of all the lowland Filipinos except those in the southern islands where the followers of the Koran had already developed that deadly spirit of fanaticism which has been the chief defense of Mohammedanism against the missionaries of every other faith.

BUT the vigorous Spanish clergy who so effectively bridged the Spanish peninsula of Moslems either by conversion or expulsion in 1500, found themselves unable to rid the Philippines of Mohammedanism either by conversion or expulsion. Moroland in the Philippines was practically as free from Spanish control and Spanish missionaries in 1896 as it was two centuries or even three centuries earlier. The bravery of the Spanish soldiers and the burning zeal of the Spanish priests were both defied by this unified population of fanatical Moslems in the southern islands.

These Moros were more than unconquerable—they were aggressively insolent. Year after year they sailed north in their tiny "vintas" to ravage the coast towns of the Christian Filipinos, kill the men and carry off the women and children for slaves. The old stone forts to be seen along the coast of Luzon and the Visayas are grim reminders of the day when these fearless Moro pirates sailed up from the south like so many wasps and within sight of Manila Bay itself terrorized the Christian inhabitants in open defiance were built and the process of making the Christian Filipinos a self-governing people was well begun by 1902. But in Moroland it was quite different.

In 1899 Brigadier General John C. Bates negotiated a treaty with the Sultan of Sulu in an attempt to solve, at least temporarily, this Moro problem. In 1903 a sort of civil government under military control was provided for Moroland and Major General Leonard Wood was placed in charge to make it work. He did. In 1904 he found the treaty with the Sultan of Sulu unsatisfactory for all concerned and abrogated it. General Tasker H. Bliss relieved him in 1906, and General John J. Pershing had charge from 1909 to 1914, at which time military control gave way to genuine civil government and a civilian governor.

During the eleven years of aggressive military administration, 1903 to 1914, the Moros were disarmed as to firearms. They were punished without fail for rebellion, piracy and fanatical violence. They received justice through the courts such as they had never known before, and they learned to appreciate it very much. A number of public schools were opened, many roads and trails were built, and the people in general were made familiar with modern institutions and accustomed to having their affairs administered by people of a different race and religion.

THUS it came about that while the rise of Protestantism and the revival of Catholicism were combining with the public schools, the courts, the newspapers and a thousand other agencies to give the Christian Filipinos a new birth of spiritual, moral and intellectual life, the military administration in Mindanao and Sulu was eliminating that deadly fanaticism which had served as an impassable barrier to the entrance of Christianity into Moroland for more than three hundred years. Consequently, when real civil government was established in Moroland in 1914, the Christian Filipinos were ready to send and did send hundreds of their best teachers into Mindanao and Sulu to educate the Moros just as the American people sent eight hundred of their best teachers to the Philippines in 1901 to educate the Christian Filipinos.

The present policy in Moroland is to Filipinize the Moros. Just as we in America are striving to Americanize the mass of foreigners in our cities, just so are the Christian Filipinos attempting to Filipinize the Mohammedans in Mindanao and Sulu. The methods employed are many. The public schools are the chief agency and more than seven hundred Christian Filipinos, a few Americans and many native Moros were teaching among the Mohammedans and pagans of the southern islands last year. In an issue of the Philippine Free Press not so many months ago the superintendent of schools in Moroland advertised for three hundred more teachers from the Christian provinces.

Another method of Filipinization has been colonization. Moroland includes the most fertile part of the archipelago, but it is sparsely populated. In 1913, when General Pershing was still in command, a colony of Christian Filipinos from the over-populated province of Cebu were given homesteads of forty acres each in the Cotabato valley adjoining the land of resident Moros. These colonists were given financial aid by the government. The chief purpose in this case was to increase the rice production of the Philippines, but the introduction of a Christian population as permanent settlers in the heart of this long-established Mohammedan community has great spiritual significance. During the seven years since the establishment of this colony the Christians and Mohammedans in this fertile valley have prospered and have become good friends and neighbors. This project started a flow of migration from the over-populated Christian provinces of the north to these under-populated,

A Moro datto, or petty chief, with his bodyguard, hardly a formidable military display. The influence of such Moslem chiefs is passing as their districts become Filipinized of the Spanish government. Not till the coming of steamboats were the Spaniards able to stop this piracy, but even steamboats and modern guns did not suffice to conquer the Moros in their homeland.

Such was the deadlock between Mohammedanism and Christianity when the Americans took over the Philippines in 1899. The fact that this deadlock was of three hundred years' standing gave us caution in trying to solve it. We established civil government among the Christian Filipinos almost immediately. Schools were opened, courts were established, roads fertile provinces of the south which is bringing from twelve to fifteen thousand Christian Filipinos into the pagan and Mohammedan regions of Mindanao and Sulu every year.

OF COURSE, the Philippine government is not carrying on any proselyting campaign. The government officials and the public schools are non-religious. But modern science, western institutions, and an increasing contact with Christian personalities are sure to have a profound effect upon the future of Mohammedanism in the Philippine Islands. It has been said repeatedly by Christian missionaries that Mohammedanism can not survive the critical atmosphere of modern science and western civilization. If this be true, the faith of Mohamet is doomed in the Philippine archipelago, because certain it is that public schools, newspapers and democratic government are opening up every corner of the archipelago to modern science and western civilization.

However, the Christians in the Philippines are not content to remain silent when the way is open to teach their faith to a people who have never heard it. Missionaries, both Protestant and Catholic, American, Spanish and Filipino, have gone into this virgin field to spread their gospel, and the presence of an increasing number of Christian immigrants greatly facilitates the establishment of Christian churches. Relieved of the responsibility for public schools and hospitals, since the government provides these, the Christian missions in Mindanao and Sulu should make great progress during the next twenty years when the first public school generation of Moros will be coming into full citizenship and when these richest valleys of the archipelago are being settled so rapidly by Christian Filipinos from the north.

Just one cloud hangs on the horizon and that one is menacing. The spirit of fanaticism is quiescent just now, and the education of all Moro children through the public schools will insure its quiescence in the future. But the lack of adequate funds to provide the necessary schools, a decline in the fairness and efficiency of the government administration, too great a weakening of the military force back of the civil government will pave the way for the spread of some local tion, keeping the government in Mindanao and Sulu scrupulously free from partisan influence and impractical theories, and providing ample government funds from the insular legislature until economic development and increasing prosperity make the revenues of these Moro provinces somewhat commensurate to their needs.

It was strange indeed that in one famous year one and the same nation should drive the Moors out of Western Europe and also enter upon an enterprise of discovery which was destined to block the advance of Mohammedanism in the East. It is equally strange that the same generation of Americans who, breaking all precedents, went to the Far East there to meet and defeat Mohammedanism on its eastern frontier, should also, against all precedents, go to Europe to help in a war which meant the break-up of the Turkish Empire on Mohammedanism's western frontier.

STILL another remarkable coincidence is Poland's double relationship to Austria and the Turks. It was a Polish army under John Sobieski that defeated the Turks besieging Vienna in 1683, thus saving Austria and Europe from Mohammedan dominion. Yet it was Austrian greed and Christian Europe's indifference that parceled out the Polish state to her ruthless Christian neighbors within less than a century after 1683.

But it was an aroused Christian conscience in America that crossed the sea in 1917 to assist in breaking the alliance between Turk and Christian, in defeating the despoilers of historic Poland, and in winning the victory that left to the Moslem Turks only a shadow of their former great empire, thus nearly completing their elimination from Europe which was so nobly begun by the Poles in 1683, and in restoring the Polish state to its rightful place among the nations of the world.

conflict between Mohammedans and Christians until it becomes a religious war throughout Moroland, reviving fanaticism and Moro solidarity in its ancient form. Such a happening would set back progress in Moroland at least a generation. It would destroy the present bright hopes of a unified Filipino nationality as a possibility of the near future. The avoidance of such a happening depends upon retaining sufficient troops in the southern islands to discourage the few recalcitrant Moros from attempting insurrec-

When People Are Sunshiny They Make the Whole World Brighter by Their Presence

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

THE two women sitting opposite me in the crowded restaurant were pleasant-looking women, with pleasantly modulated voices. Their luncheons, of sandwiches and milk, were sensibly moderate for the warm day; their neat frocks of linen were cool and practical. I liked them at sight—found myself wishing that I knew them. And, because I felt that way and, incidentally, because they did not, in any manner, try to keep their conversation from me, I found myself listening, off and on, to the words that passed between them.

They were talking about some other woman—a friend, of whom both were quite evidently very fond. Of her looks they spoke, and of her mental qualities. They discussed, in extremely complimentary terms, her talents as a housekeeper and as a home-maker. And then they came, last of all, to the analysis of that elusive quality called charm, which was evidently the outstanding feature of her unusual personality.

"Sometimes," one of the women said, "I can scarcely understand—despite our love for her—why May has so many friends. Everybody has a good word to say of her. No social gathering seems complete without her; no plan, that doesn't include her, seems at all worth while. Of course we know that she's pretty and attractive and sweet and good company—but so are ever so many other women who aren't nearly so popular. I wonder what there is about her that makes people care, so sincerely, to have her with them?"

The other woman looked thoughtfully off into space for a moment before she answered.

"I don't quite know how to explain it, myself," she said at last, "that something about her personality that makes her so wonderful! Only—" she hesitated, "only—well, I've often thought that when she enters a room it's as if somebody had pulled back a curtain and let in the sunlight! I can't explain why it is, but it's so."

And—
"Yes, you're right!" agreed the other woman. And they paid their check and went out together and left me wishing that I, too, might be a friend of this May—who was like sunlight!

IN THIS world—that has seemed even a bit more chaotic than usual in the last few years—a sunshiny person is like a pearl of great price. The universe seems crowded to overflowing with people who have troubles that need airing—with other folk who feel that they must complain about prevailing conditions, that they must register a protest against hard times, and our form of government, and taxes, and dress fashions and the motion pictures. It's seldom, now-a-days, that a group of people can spend a comfortable hour or two together without becoming wrathful over some real or fancied evil. It's seldom that an afternoon or an evening can be passed amicably without an argument arising over some great, or trivial, point of difference. Folk are too prone, in this age and generation, to protest against nearly every innovation; and they are quite as likely to turn, at a moment's notice, against the old order by which we have all lived so long—and so comfortably.

That's why people who are sunshiny—who can enter a room with smiles and can be a part of a group without contributing anything either unpleasant or upsetting to that group—are so well loved. That's why they're such a blessed relief, such an untold joy, to their friends and acquaintances. That's why we wish—all of us—that there were more of them!

Perhaps one of the best known jingles in the world is the little verse that was written, some years ago, by one of our American poets. It's been quoted so often that I'm sure most all of you know it. And yet it's the sort of a verse that will always bear quoting again. For it says:

"Laugh and the world laughs with you,
Weep and you weep alone;
For the sad old earth has need of your mirth,
It has sorrow enough of its own!"

It's a happy sort of a little rhyme, isn't it? And it's true, so true! For it gives the secret of being liked, and a sure recipe for popularity. If every one of us would follow the sage advice of the four short lines we'd each be the sort of a person that May—who was so pleasantly under discussion at the luncheon table—is. We'd each be the sort of a person whose entrance into a room is like the drawing back of a curtain—the letting in of sunlight.

Sunshiny people—there aren't too many of them, unfortunately! That's why they stand out, with such cameo distinctness, wherever they may be. That's why they're a topic of conversation, why their "rare charm" is a matter of comment. That's why their friends wonder about them—because they are all too few!

TO BE a sunshiny person, a real sunshiny person, one doesn't have to go laughing through life—chuckling in the face of grief, and shouting with mirth in homes where sorrow is a guest. That isn't necessary. Sunshine is never unsympathetic or callous, and real sunshiny people are never that way, either. The little verse doesn't mean, when it says "laugh and the world laughs with you," that you must go about forcing humorous situations—that you must play the clown continually. Folk don't enjoy an insincerely happy person—a person who laughs at everything—any more than they enjoy the complainers and the knockers and the arguers!

No, indeed! Sunshiny people, of the sort who make the world better just because they're a part of it, are the kind who are happy because of something inside of their souls and hearts—something invisible that radiates, halo-like, about them. They're happy, but happiness isn't the only thing that they have to give to their friends, and even to the chance folk who happen to cross their paths. For they have keen sympathy to give, and another quality—a quality that might be called sympathetic understanding.

The sunlight gives warmth to our lives, and color, and beauty. It makes the plants and fruits and flowers grow—it makes a dull landscape take on untold glory, it fills the blue sky with a promise of Heaven. A world upon which the sun never shone would be a dreary place in which to live.

And a world with the sunshiny people all taken from it would be just as hopeless and unhappy as a world with no sunshine. For they're almost as necessary to our lives and to our peace of mind. They give us faith to carry on—they give us hope in our dark moments, and encouragement in our hours of conflict. Just knowing that a sunshiny person is near is almost enough to drive the shadows of doubt away.

Try—friends of mine—to be people of the sunshine! Don't dwell in the shadows—don't be ever on the lookout for storm clouds and tempests. Make the world brighter—just as the sunshine does—so that flowers of pure gladness will bloom in the hearts of those who know you!

The President's Outing

PUTTING aside the cares of state for a time, President Harding has been camping out in the open on a Maryland hillside, in the romantic Blue Ridge. With him were his friends, Thomas Alva Edison, Henry Ford and Mr. Firestone, and they have had a real good time. One familiar face which has graced such outings in the past—that of John Burroughs, nature-lover and wise man of the woods—was missing, but not forgotten. These four laid big business and all of its worries on the shelf and went back to the simple life, to draw from close contact with nature a fresh supply of strength and inspiration for the strenuous days to come.

It has been wisely said that the heart of a boy is hidden away somewhere in every good man's breast. Camping in the woods brings out the latent love of adventure. Nothing sets the forces of rejuvenation astir like good appetite, sound sleep, free exercise, and that physical attunement which usually attend a spell in the woods, near to good fishing by lake or stream. Sounder body means clearer brain, and we may venture the guess that many a hard problem has been discussed by the camp-fire, and many a way out of a difficult situation found in these enjoyable hours, while swapping views under the cool greenwood shade.

What streams of sapient suggestion may have flowed from the campers when, after enjoying their evening meal, they took up the graver topics of the time. We can imagine the talk mellowing down into genial warmth when the President, in stentorian tones, which even the awe-struck villagers nearby could hear, undertook to instruct Mr. Edison on the best way to hook and land a tarpon, or to show Henry Ford how wood ought to be chopped, while Mr. Firestone's six shining steeds stood chaffing, awaiting their distinguished riders. A merry mounting it was when, with the coatless President in the lead, they cantered up hill and down, finally fording the creek so that the camera men might get a good picture.

Socrates and his friends had their favorite outing by the wooded banks of a river, where their discussions ran the entire gamut from pure philanthropy to practical politics and patriotism; but it is not recorded that those wise old fellows ever reached such a height of enjoyment as these, under the shadows of the Blue Ridge. No one could imagine Socrates in his shirt sleeves. Thoreau tells how, in his Walden camp, he used to walk around coatless and liked it. It is a good, levelling custom, and brings a man down from the clouds. But Thoreau loved to be alone in his solitude. Far more uplifting is it to have the companionship of congenial minds.

There were moments in the Presidential camp when the proprieties had full sway. Bishop Anderson preached, and the whole countryside population was welcomed to swell the audience. The good Bishop, evidently deeming the opportunity providential, told his hearers and especially the President, who sat on the little platform near him, that peace, brotherhood, and good-will—the beginning of the Kingdom of Christ on earth—can come only as the Christ spirit enters the hearts of men; and that any movement in which God has no recognition can not bring enduring results, a proposition sound both in theology and logic, and one which our statesmen and even the churches seem too often to overlook.

But all things have an end and the holiday of our distinguished campers sped all too soon. In the days to come, when the President tackles big problems, he may derive a certain sense of satisfaction from remembering those joyous hours he passed with his companions in the Blue Ridge, and the wonderfully restful nights which brought counsel and refreshment when he slept under a tent "with his ear close to the ground."

Human Nature

HUMAN Nature being what it is, we may expect war to continue indefinitely," said at least five fervid Commencement speakers at different colleges this summer.

With these college orators, that much abused phrase seems to settle the question for the need of military preparation, of the existence indefinitely of war and race prejudice and everything else that is difficult for "human nature" to accomplish. And if human nature were the inflexible thing that these speakers think it is, war and race hate and wickedness and injustice and selfishness generally would continue, without any hope of better conditions.

But human nature is not an inflexible thing. It is capable of vast changes. The fact that human nature is a thing of immeasured possibilities for development is the most cheerful and hopeful fact of history.

"Ye must be born anew," said Jesus, announcing for the first time in earthly religious history the fact of flexibility in human nature.

"If any man is in Christ, he is a new creature," said Paul, getting his statement from the teaching of his Lord. "Old things have passed away. All things have become new," he says, and then, with great significance strikes out with this daring phrase, "put off the old man, and put on the new."

The fact of the matter is that the commencement orators who talk about "human nature being what it is," have never read their Bibles, or if they have, they have either missed the teaching about the new birth, or they don't believe it.

Men who hate can become men who love. Men who think war is necessary can be made to have a conviction that it is not. Men who are unjust can become just. Men who steal can become honest. Men who drink can become total abstainers. Men who are lustful can become pure. Men who for years have denied God and disobeyed his laws, can become obedient and loving children.

There are no limits to the flexibility and change capable in Human Nature. It is time the pessimistic militarists waked up to this great fact. It is the one fact on which all human progress and happiness depends.

Conquering the Desert

RECENT archeological finds by Professor Flinders Petrie and his expert helpers during two winters' work in the great Western desert, seventy miles south of Cairo, have brought to light further evidence that the ancient Egyptians believed in continued existence after death, which would be substantially a replica of the present life. Digging in a cemetery discovered among the sand dunes, the excavators found in the tombs many little groups of sculptured figures, representing domestic scenes from the ordinary daily round of household life and custom. Carved and painted articles, including stone cups and vases or jars of copper and alabaster, were among the discoveries, which in the opinion of the experts show that we must now go back more than 8,000 years to learn the beginnings of civilization and art as it then flourished in the land of the Nile. The carvings and paintings were surprisingly good, in the opinion of the experts, and the whole collection together made it possible to reconstruct many details of that long-forgotten civilization of 8,000 years ago.

In the passing of the ages the desert has widened its borders. Who can tell what secrets it may hold which will yet be brought to light; what eras of history may lie buried under those silent sands? Modern science, in its rapid progress, may transform the "waste places," and the change may bring out many revelations.

As far as existing records show, the great desert between Bagdad and Jerusalem has been almost impassable from time immemorial. Caravans have struggled across it by a tortuous road and many have perished. Now its terrors have been conquered by the airplane, which has discovered a practicable road that cuts the distance in half. The day may yet come when all the difficulties of the desert will be solved by railroad transportation.

Dear Christian Herald:

I want to avail myself of the privilege to thank you for that splendid article you printed in the last issue of the Christian Herald by the "Mere Man" in his story of his experience with his boy in the Sunday school. I wish it could be printed in tract form and sent broadcast. It certainly hit the nail on the head. Let me say that I enjoy the paper very much and thank God for a man who still loves the Bible and holds to its truths. May God bless you in your work.

Fraternally,

The Creed of Jesus

IN A recent review of five books on "Christianity in the Modern World," Professor Harry F. Ward, of the Department of Ethics in Union Theological Seminary, New York, says:

"The facts of modern life, as well as our inmost longings, require that we find some unifying purpose for our economic life and for our now separate governments. It is a matter of dynamics; Where is the power coming from? It is a matter of mechanics: How is the power to be applied to the necessary task? Concerning this central problem of social organization, Christianity has yet to find its message."

But after all, is it a matter of dynamics or mechanics? Is it not rather a matter of acceptance of the creed of Jesus, and the application of that creed to all our economic life, and to all government?

The plain fact is that Jesus was not a philosopher as we commonly use the term. He saw one thing as necessary for human happiness and power, and He emphasized that one thing all the time. The one thing that was fundamental was the supreme love of God and one's neighbor. On that basis all human happiness and progress would go forward.

And right here is where the human race up to the present moment in history has failed. There is plenty of nominal Christianity. It has expressed itself in rituals, ceremonies, rites, elaborate organization, sectarianism, long theological creeds, narrow dogmas, insistence on certain kinds of clothing for religious teachers and priests, and forms of worship. But when the one thing that Jesus said was the most important of all has been taught, the nominal Christian has repudiated it and failed to practise it.

There was plenty of so-called Christianity in the world before the war. Europe was covered over with beautiful and expensive cathedrals, but in them there had not been learned and practised the creed of Jesus, of love to God and one's neighbor. There was nothing in the nominal Christianity of the nations of the world, even those that called themselves Christian, to prevent them from hating their neighbors and trying to kill them.

In every instance where there has been an honest attempt to obey even a part of the teaching of Jesus, the world has been tremendously helped forward. But the failure to accept and practise in practical ways the creed of Jesus is still the greatest failure of the race. It is not a question of theology or philosophy. It is a question of willingness on the part of humanity to love God and one's neighbor. That is the sticking-point. Capital knows that if it practised this way of life, and labor knows that if it joined with capital in obedience to it, there would be an end to all hatred and injustice and wrong. There is no other way.

But the world repudiates this way. Can it find any other?

Love never faileth. But humanity is failing to accept the way of the Master. It will continue to suffer and agonize and struggle and lose the joy of living, until it falls at Jesus' feet and says, "My Lord and my God!" And then rises to practise His creed of love to God and neighbor.

A Great Bible Student Gone

IN THE death of Rev. Cyrus I. Scofield, at the age of 78, the world loses one of its ablest Bible scholars and foremost Christian expositors. Dr. Scofield was a man of varied talents and wide experience. Trained to the law, he had served with honor and distinction in the army, at the bar, and in the Kansas legislature. While acting as United States Attorney in Kansas, he became a convert to Christianity. He afterwards served in several pastorates, including one in Dallas, Texas, and later, in the Moody Church at Northfield.

But while he loved pastoral work, his great passion was for Bible study. Never was there a more diligent student of the Word. And his intense application bore fruit, for few men in this generation have won a more deserved popularity among Bible lovers. As editor of the Scofield Reference Bible, he became known on two continents, and the value of his research and exposition work is recognized through the Christian world. During his forty years of activity and tireless investigation, he was a helper to countless multitudes seeking light on the Word. Altogether, a noble life, well-rounded out, and one the influence of which will long be felt wherever the Bible is read and studied.

The World News of the Week

Japan Agrees to Participate in Far Eastern Discussions

ASSURED by Secretary Hughes that the United States was willing to enter discussions, prior to the assembling of the international conference proposed by President Harding, concerning the nature and scope of the Pacific and Far Eastern questions to be considered, the Japanese government has agreed formally to full participation. Japan's acceptance was conveyed in a note cordial in tone and caused much gratification among the members of the Harding administration, completing as it did the acceptances of those Powers invited to participate.

The State Department's announcement of Japan's action revealed that when she accepted that part of the President's proposal which suggested a conference for the limitation of armaments she had inquired as to the nature and scope of the other questions to be discussed. A memorandum then was sent to Tokio asking that Japan refrain from delaying arrangements for the conference by pressing her inquiries on this point, "in view of the fact that it is desirable that the full acceptance of the invitation of the American government leave this matter open for adjustment in the precise agenda to be arrived at later."

Japan accepted this view and expressed an intention "gladly to accept an invitation," recognizing that the discussion of Pacific and Far Eastern problems is based on the close bearing they have on the question of the limitation of armaments. "Desiring, as they do, to contribute to the establishment of an enduring peace and to the advancement of human welfare, the Japanese Government earnestly hope that the proposed conference may attain the expected results, and their ideals may thereby be brought nearer to realization," the reply stated.

There was, however, a qualification in the final paragraph of Japan's note, which read: "In order to insure the success of the conference, the Japanese government deem it advisable that the agenda thereof should be arranged in accordance with the main object of the discussion as above defined, and that introduction therein of problems such as are of sole concern to certain particular Powers or such matters that may be regarded accomplished facts should be scrupulously avoided." That sentence might be interpreted—so as to exclude some of the most important points of difference between the United States and Japan.

Before the formal invitations are issued by President Harding, there must be other exchanges with the Powers regarding the time and place of holding the conference. The State Department announced that in addition to Great Britain, France, Italy and Japan other nations having interests in the Far East might be invited to take part in the discussion.

President Asks Aid for Railroads

PRESIDENT HARDING, in a special message to the Senate and House, has proposed a plan for the funding of the debts which the railways owe to the government on account of capital expenditures for their benefit under war-time control and for the payment of the cash which the government owes to the companies. His proposal was that the War Finance Corporation be empowered to take over railroad funding securities now held by the Director General of Railways in an amount up to $500,000,000. With these securities as a basis, the Corporation would advance to the Director General cash sums to be paid to the roads to settle the claims they hold against the Government.

Mr. Harding explained that "No added expense, no added investment, is required on the part of the government; there is no added liability, no added tax burden. It is merely the grant of the authority necessary to enable a most useful and efficient government agency to use its available funds to purchase securities for which Congress has already authorized the issue, and turn them into channels of finance ready to float them." "The railroads," he added, "need only this financial aid which the fulfillment of our obligations will bestow to inaugurate their far-reaching revival. Its effects will be felt in varied industries and will banish to a large degree the depression which, though inevitable in war's aftermath, we are all so anxious to see ended."

The Interstate Commerce Committees of both Houses at once prepared to draft legislation to revive unwillingness to decide this question in advance of the meeting of the Supreme Council on August 4, to which France had given her assent. A French note of London termed the attitude of the British "unfriendly," and gave warning that France would not be prepared to attend the Supreme Council meeting if her allies refused to support her demand on Germany for permission to transport troops to Silesia, a demand which Germany has refused to grant when made by France alone.

The British reply to the French note pointed out that France's charge produced a very grave situation and that persistence in such a policy might endanger the entente. The Allied statesmen were making every effort to compose the differences, and a free and frank discussion of the problems was being continued, with the leaders optimistic that a basis would be found for preserving the allied solidarity so vital to the peace of Europe.

Irish Acceptance Predicted

CONFIDENT predictions that Eamonn de Valera and the members of his Irish Republican cabinet have found in the proposals of Premier Lloyd George the basis for a peace conference were carried in Dublin despatches. It was said a unanimous decision had been reached on the matters under discussion and the cheerfulness manifested by the participants made it unthinkable that that decision had been for a rupture of the negotiations. It was considered unlikely the Dail Eireann, would meet until summoned to appoint plenipotentiaries to a London conference.

One of the big obstacles has been the question of finances and it was stated that an acceptable solution had been reached on this in the shape of Irish acceptance of a portion of the British war debt instead of an annual contribution to the British Exchequer, which the Irish opposed as being in the nature of a tribute.

Arrangements were being made for a meeting between Mr. de Valera and Sir James Craig, the Ulster Premier, at which they will attempt to work out the relationship between northern and southern Ireland, another difficult question.

BILL FOR FUNDING ALLIED DEBT ADVANCED. The Senate Finance Committee, by a vote of 9 to 5, has ordered a favorable report on the bill urged by President Harding to authorize the funding of the Allied debt to the United States and giving the Secretary of the Treasury unlimited authority, subject to the President's approval, to conduct the necessary negotiations to that end.

FIGHTING LAGS IN ASIA MINOR. The Greek forces in Asia Minor having defeated the efforts of the Turkish Nationalists to assume the offensive, fighting on a large scale has ceased while each side reorganizes its forces and improves lines of communications. The Greeks claimed the Turkish resistance was broken with the Kemalists having lost 60,000 men, but neutral sources did not confirm this.

BOGUS LIQUOR STAMPS SEIZED. The gigantic scope on which rum-runners are endeavoring to do business was revealed by the seizure by Secret Service agents in New York City of counterfeit revenue stamps having a face value of $2,000,000. Many thousands of forged liquor labels and much collateral paraphernalia of the bootleggers also were taken in the raids.

HUGHES SENDS DEMAND TO RUSSIA. Secretary Hughes has sent to the Russian Soviet government a demand that the Americans now being held as prisoners be released as soon as possible. The communication was informal, since the American government refuses to deal with the Soviet officials and was transmitted through the American consul at Reval.

MEXICAN CONGRESS REFUSES OBREGON REQUEST. The Mexican Chamber of Deputies has defeated a request by President Obregon that extraordinary powers be granted to him to revise Article XXVII of the Constitution nationalizing oil deposits, to which American objections have been made. The Senate granted the request.

PRESIDENT HARDING GOES CAMPING OUT WITH DISTINGUISHED HOSTS

the War Finance Corporation to carry out the President's recommendations.

Mr. Harding's message also suggested that the Corporation be authorized to take care of agricultural needs and to increase credit for financing agricultural exports. Senator Kellogg introduced in the Senate a bill along those lines and increasing the Corporation's revolving credit fund from $500,000,000 to $1,000,000,000, as a substitute for the Norris measure to create a government export finance corporation with $100,000,000 capital.

Silesian Differences Continue

THE differences between the British and French governments over Upper Silesia, regarding which it appeared a compromise had been reached, again have flared up and have caused an exchange of notes much sharper in tone than is customary among the Allies.

The trouble was due to French insistence on sending reinforcements to Silesia and to British and Italian

CHAPTER IX

By C. H. LERRIGO

Illustrated by William C. McNulty

THERE was an old tree-trunk lying beneath the branches of the tree into which I had climbed to observe Persmann's strange behavior, and he sank down on it as if quite exhausted. In response to his invitation to come down so he could tell me a few things, I placed myself gingerly on the extreme end ready to run at the first sign of an insane outbreak.

"I suppose you think I'm both crazy and a villain," he said, noticing my attitude. "Maybe I am. You think I've done a lot of harm to Major Bassel. Maybe I have."

"I think you are responsible for Major Bassel being obliged to consider going to work at a poor job instead of taking a responsible place. That's what he has to face now. When he is a little stronger he is going to work as a clerk, because he cannot step into a responsible position while his business reputation is under a cloud. And not only that, but he has lost a comfortable home and had to take on a big load of debt."

"Yes, and you all blame it all on me. You would be surprised to know that he himself is responsible for it. When he receipted for that package it was carelessly wrapped in manila paper. He checked its contents, gave a receipt, wrapped it in the same paper and allowed it to lie on his desk by the side of a very similar package which he had brought to the office that morning. Later in the day he asked Harold, the office boy, to put that package in the vault. Harold did his best. Whether he knew the value of the package, I can't say. When Mr. Bassel went out he picked up the other package and left it at a shoemaker's, telling him that it contained a pair of gymnasium shoes that needed some stitching. Then he went to war and forgot all about it."

"AND the package he left at the shoemaker's contained the bonds?"

"It did. The shoemaker was very busy and the package lay unopened for several days. Then the surprised shoemaker telephoned to ask Mr. Bassel or someone from the Trust Company to call. I went, on my way home. I took the package home with me. It was Saturday evening and I had all day Sunday to think of what I could do with these securities which had just simply dropped into my hands."

"And you just kept them?"

"I didn't steal them. I just simply put off taking them back. It ran on for days and weeks and months and no questions were ever asked. Then Major Bassel was reported killed and I still held the package."

"I'd think you might have given it up then, anyway," I said, bitterly.

"What difference did that make? It was no loss to his people. Then suddenly came the demand for the securities. Acting on my first impulse I denied having any knowledge of them, and then it was too late to make good. But so long as he did not return, I knew that the Trust Company would not charge it against his family. The loss would be borne by a rich company that would never feel it."

"But it is not. It is borne by Major Bassel."

"Yes. That was after he came back. It worried me as soon as I learned of it, and it's been worrying me ever since. I used to like Bassel, and I admired the way he had gone overseas to do work that I hadn't the nerve to do. But although I was worried for him, I was worried a lot more for myself, fearing that he would track the papers down."

"That's why you tried to pass your nephew off as a girl, is it?" I asked.

"Oh, you know that, too? Yes. It was a crazy thing to do. So were a lot of other things. But I seem to have been about half crazy and getting worse. One night I felt so badly I got up and took the package to Justamere Cabin, thinking I would just throw it in and let Bassel guess where it came from. But just as I was opening the screen you let out a terrible scream and it was all I could do to get away without notice."

"WHY didn't you try it again?"

"I felt differently the next day. I wanted to keep it. I've been that way for years, ever since I decided to be a rich man. Sometimes I'll brave anything to get my hands on what I want. At other times I want to be straight, and I'm willing to sacrifice everything in the effort. Tomorrow I'll be sorry I told you all this, and I'll probably say you dreamed it. Talk about being crazy! I don't know which of these times I'm crazy and which sane."

"Oh, you're sane enough now," I said. "Can't you see that there isn't any money that could pay you for losing your manhood. It isn't too late, even yet. Let's go tell Major Bassel now."

"No, that wouldn't do much good," said Persmann, who was now quiet and self-possessed. "If I'm going to do anything, I'll do it right. I'm obliged to report at the office tomorrow. They've been sending for me. I'll go in and tell the president. Then it will relieve Major Bassel of the responsibility of getting possession of those securities and put the responsibility on the Trust Company. A big, powerful cor-

There was an old tree-trunk lying beneath the branches of the tree into which I had climbed to observe Persmann's strange behavior and he sank down on it as if quite exhausted

"You haven't any objection to my going to the city on some business, have you, Major?" I asked.

"Do you have to go today, Jerry?" asked the Major. "There's a chance of our having some company you would like to see."

"I don't care about company," said I. "This is very important business."

"But you ought to stay here with father today, Jerry," objected Kate. "Don't you know that this is his last day at home? Tomorrow he begins that horrid job."

"That job at the plow works?" I asked. "You never are going to take that miserable clerkship, Major."

"I'm going to do some kind of honest work, Jerry. And I've got to begin right soon. That clerkship is honorable work."

I came pretty near giving away my secret, right then, by telling them that I had some information that would just clear up everything and put the Major back where he belonged, but I held myself in time.

"I'll come home just as early as I can, Major, and we'll go for a picnic lunch," I promised. And I thought to myself that if things went well this morning the picnic lunch would indeed be a celebration.

MATTERS did not start in the very best possible way. Kent and I took the eight-thirty o'clock Interurban. Quite a little crowd was waiting to go, and among them was Mr. Persmann. But he was an entirely different Mr. Persmann this morning. Shaved, dressed in his city clothes, and apparently in his normal mind, he looked very little like the wild woodsman who had been so frantic yesterday. I'm not sure he saw me at all, but at least he took pains not to recognize me. I had to get a glimpse of the fresh scar on his forehead to assure myself that yesterday evening's event had really happened.

"Probably he's afraid that I shall say something before Kent," I thought. "When we get to the city he will be different."

But even when I reached the offices of the Invincible Trust Company I failed to find the Persmann of the evening before.

"I wasn't myself last evening," he said to me hastily. "I don't know just what nonsense I may have told you, but it amounts to nothing. You would best forget all about our meeting."

But I did not propose to do anything of the kind. On the contrary I inquired for Mr. Blair, the president. It seemed that he would not be visible until eleven o'clock, so I went away for an hour or so. But at eleven Mr. Blair had just been called away and would not return until two in the afternoon.

I began to feel rather stubborn and told myself that I would be back at two o'clock with a determination to be both seen and heard. If Mr.

Persmann had suffered a lapse of memory and forgotten the things that he had told to me, it should not interfere with my telling all I knew, and neither would it interfere with making some inquiries of that shoe repair man, and a few others. The very fact that someone had seen the package since Major Bassel left the Trust Company would go far toward clearing his record.

Then I remembered that Persmann had given no name to the shoemaker, and I thought what a terrible thing it would be if the whole story he told me had been some wild invention of the mind of a man half crazy with worry; and my spirits took a tremendous drop. I began to doubt if I had any right to take up the time of so important a man as the president of the Invincible Trust Company.

BUT I went back to the office at two o'clock and just as I came in sight of the door, whom should I see going in but my own father.

I shouted at the top of my lungs: "Oh, dad! Wait a minute! Wait for me!"

He turned and stood there until I came up. Then I saw that Major Bassel and a stranger were with him.

"Who is this strange boy, Bassel?" father asked,

Backsliders and Burden-Bearers

A Sermon by REV. S. EDWARD YOUNG, D.D.*

TEXT—Zech. 7:11. "They gave a backsliding shoulder."—(Literal translation).

UNTIL the present time in certain parts of Western Asia when you step ashore burden-bearers—some four or five or half dozen of them—strap your baggage to a pole. They shoulder the pole, the tallest man ahead, the next tallest at the rear, those in between building up their shoulders by cushions, so the load will be distributed equally. Then away they go, with a swing and a song!

If one of the burden-bearers is lazy enough and mean enough, he slyly drops his shoulder as they march along and thus carries no weight. May we not believe this is the figure, rather than that of the ox rebelling against the yoke, which Zechariah has in mind and Nehemiah also in a similar connection, when using the expression, "They gave a backsliding shoulder?" In either case, the thing signified is shirking one's share of the common task.

Jehovah is laying burdens on His people. Here is the burden of giving everybody justice—in Zechariah's phrase, "Execute true judgment." Nothing is deeper in human nature than the sense of justice. A few summers ago it was my privilege to have charge of two boys at our cottage in the woods of Canada. If truth must be told, there were occasionally sharp differences of opinion. But I learned that summer that the way to manage boys is to be absolutely just. Whenever the point of discord was patiently talked through, and the everlasting principles of right and wrong were applied, a perfectly amicable agreement was reached in which both concurred completely.

The sense of justice in our breasts is a mirroring of the Eternal's throne. Today's unrest will not go out of the world till there is justice to all by all. This, in the last analysis, means till the law of God is obeyed by everybody. Here is the Old Testament promise concerning Christ, "He shall not fail nor be discouraged till He have set judgment in the earth." The burden of the establishment of that judgment you and I are to bear with Him. Is it right that you and I should have the wealth and comforts and freedom and gospel light and Armenia starve and be ground under the cruel heel of tyranny? Is it just that our children be reared in refinement and religious culture, and those of the tenements—all created by the same God—in coarseness and vice?

DO YOU ever suspect a backsliding shoulder in the home? Each should carry a just share of home's cares. Does one give the backsliding shoulder?

Have you noticed some backsliding shoulders in the community? Neighbors who desired your section to remain socially what it was, though well able to do their part, gave the backsliding shoulder and the neighborhood improvement association left the load to others, till all dropped out and did whatever shirking could do to make your neighborhood like a tenement district. There is a proposal now to protect by some new movement your whole section: but how many are going to share the load?

New burdens of defending the Lord's Day are being imposed in legislative halls. "Oh, but," you say, "that tall man at the front will attend to that. And that dear old soul who is always anxious about some good work, she will carry the back end of the pole." By and by the load is too heavy and they fall. Yonder are the commercialized professional game-fields and the play-houses, packed Sunday afternoon and evening when those youth and others ought to be in Sunday school and church. Somebody has shirked and allowed the forces of wrong to triumph!

Would anything cause you to suspect backsliding shoulders in the church? The night before last at an important conference of officers and others one of our most faithful officers, noticing the many absent, exclaimed in righteous indignation, "I had other pressing work to do; but I put it aside, and most of those who are staying away could have done the same." Let us concede that this church is probably no worse than the average; yet it is lamentable that whatever we have to do, the same steady few are expected to bear the brunt. That man who is always there—leave it to him. He is willing. That woman, who has as many good reasons as anybody else to be absent and beg off from work—shove it off on to her.

These people who are in church Sunday morning and Sunday evening and Wednesday evening and other evenings are here because they are tremendously interested. Those who scan religious papers and pamphlets to find out how Christ's work is going on the world around do so because they are interested in His work.

The Lord lays upon us the burden of sympathy with human needs. In Zechariah's phrase: "Show mercy and compassion, every man to his brother"—brother-man near or far—"and oppress not the widow nor the fatherless, the stranger nor the poor." In short, be Christlike; for His mission, as He read it from Isaiah in the Nazareth synagogue, is: "The spirit of the Lord God is upon me; because the Lord hath anointed me to preach good tidings unto the meek; He hath sent me to bind up the broken-hearted, to proclaim liberty to the captives, and the opening of prison to them that are bound."

"So let our lips and lives express
The Holy Gospel we profess.
So let our works and virtues shine
To prove the doctrine all divine."

COME, now, let us line up under the burden-pole. What shall the standard be? That man of stature there at the front, we do not propose to come up to him! Make him droop his shoulder and crouch a little. The rear fellow, have him bend over a bit.

Our Sunday Service at Home

The Christian Herald Sermon is now read in many Homes as a Sunday Evening Service, a simple form of conducting which is outlined below. Neighbors should be cordially invited

Order of Service

Opening Hymn—"O Day of Rest and Gladness" or "From Every Stormy Wind that Blows."

Invocation—"The Lord's Prayer"—all join.

Scripture Reading—"The Parable of the Great Supper." Luke 14:7-15.

Dr. Jowett's Sunday Meditation (see page 570, first column).

Sermon—"BACKSLIDERS AND BURDEN-BEARERS"—To be read aloud by the head of the household or his substitute.

Requests for Prayer—these may be offered by any of those present who feel led to do so. The requests may be forwarded to Pastor Sheldon, in New York, for submission to the Prayer League.

Closing Hymn—"Sun of My Soul, Thou Saviour Dear," or "Blessed Assurance."

Benediction—by Pastor Charles M. Sheldon to be read aloud.

Trusting in the power which brought us together in the bonds of common Brotherhood, we commit our souls to His keeping who brought us hither. And in His name who blesses all sorts and conditions of men, may we go from this worship resolved to spread His truth and live His life as best we may with the help we know He will bestow upon our asking. For the Master's sake. AMEN.

Bring these to our level. Is that the way? Would we be willing to do that? Just because we are pigmies, dwarf them? Stand straight there, you six feet three inches, while we cushion up! We will lay on our diminutive stature our recognition of the high standard and our desire to reach it. There will be a sort of spiritual working up. Remember, "not failure; but low aim in sin."

Great reforms above us? Yes, but it is a good beginning to say that they ought to be supported and that we will try our best to reach them. We will not let others carry the whole load of Prohibition, for instance, just because we do not like the methods of certain persons who helped put it through. The Christianization of your neighborhood, and then the next, and the next, and of America, and the world, you may say are beyond us. Yes, yet we must do your share and make a start by endorsing it and endeavoring to build toward it.

We line up under the pole. But who is that at the front so tall and strong and glorious? Is it not He who took up this task first, He who instituted the reformation of the entire world. He who has the white man's and the black man's and the yellow man's and the red man's and every man's burden on His shoulders? He took the cross first, took it as His own cross and bare it. I speak of Him whose spiritual stature rises above that of all others—Jesus, the Nazarene. Would anybody try to lower His standard? Nay, rather, though we fail and flounder and crawl along, let us never want our ideals to be less than His. When we stumble, we must struggle up again and go on. Stand on one of His promises. That promise will go to the end unbroken. If you stay on it, though you fall, you will fall on the promise and will still keep going.

THIS is the only hope of the land we live in; that there will be enough people everlastingly at it who will not lower their standards to suit the times or the people round about them, who will not trade off their faith or trample on it, or try to get away from it, but who will stick to it, even if they stick alone. God bless them! They are the salt of the earth. They are the disturbers of conscience and many a man's conscience needs to be disturbed. They are not angular, or cross-grained, or spoiling for a fight, but if fight they must to keep God's ideals clearly before their fellow mortals, then fight they will.

They are like an old Long Island Quaker who was known to believe that he must carry out the Master's expression that when he was smitten on the one cheek he should turn the other. A pugnacious individual knowing this, came up and gave him a resounding blow on the right side of his face. The gentle old Quaker turned the left, and the bully gave him a blow on that. Then the Quaker calmly said, "Friend, I have done with thee as the Lord hath said, and now I am going to knock the devil out of thee." And he thrashed him soundly. Each one has his cross to bear. When, by the by, it is entirely plain that somebody is not opposing you but opposing the Lord Himself, it may then be time for you to adopt the latter portion of the old Quaker's program.

It may possibly be that the reader of this sermon will feel himself impelled, like Simon of Cyrene, to help to bear Christ's cross after Him. Shun it not. Take it up! Go on, whatever it is you have to do in His name. Your cross may be to have to endure that person who gets you nettled and fidgety; but what is the use in my trying to specify it? You will not have to hunt around long to find your cross. What usually takes some hunting is to find the grace to bear it.

ARE we ready at last to line up under the burden-pole? Have you dismissed unfaith and selfishness and fault-finding sufficiently just to take hold and do your whole duty uncomplainingly and uncriticizingly? What an error it is to think that you have done something admirable, when you have merely pointed out somebody else's fault.

One of the finest things in the way of always getting people forward is by approving their good points rather than by denouncing their weaknesses. In that respect your successful dealing with men will be parallel to Paul's and the whole New Testament idea—that of winning men to better work by commendation instead of condemnation. Our Master wants us to be singing, and to go gladly under our load. When we "carry on" with fine spirits that are like-minded, we discover how much easier the once crushing weight becomes.

You translate into obedience the words of Jesus: "Take my yoke upon you and learn of me . . . for my yoke is easy and my burden is light." With Him you draw life's heavy cargo. With Him you plow life's long furrow. In company with Him there is high glee in the doing of it. Each takes his or her place under the burden-pole, knowing that the front end of it is upon the Great Master's shoulder.

The New Commandment

PROF. WALTER LINGLE of Union Theological Seminary, Virginia, related in a recent issue of the Biblical Review this story of Rev. Dr. Samuel Rutherford, who was a member of the Westminster Assembly which framed the Shorter Catechism and the Confession of Faith:

His home was noted for the Christian atmosphere which pervaded it. One Saturday night, while he was conducting worship, a stranger with an unusually intelligent face asked for the privilege of spending the Sabbath in the home. Dr. Rutherford was in the midst of catechizing his children and when it came the stranger's turn, asked him this question: "How many commandments are there?" The stranger promptly responded: "Eleven."

With some severity, Dr. Rutherford replied: "What do you mean, sir? I did not suppose that any man of your intelligence in all this realm would have made such an answer." Nothing disquieted the stranger replied: "A new commandment I give unto you, that ye love one another; even as I have loved you, that ye also love one another."

The stranger turned out to be Archbishop James Ussher of Ireland, the great scholar who worked out the chronology in the margin of our Bibles, who had planned to spend a Sabbath in the home incognito. Such a distinguished guest could not remain incognito long, and next morning he preached a notable sermon on "The New Commandment."

The High Calling

SUNDAY. I Pet. 1:15. "But like as He which called you is holy, be ye yourselves also holy in all manner of living." The holy God is to be the formative force in our life, and to Him are we to be devoted in close and intimate conformity. "As He which called you." The call is a Divine pledge. The acceptance of the call implies a human obligation. There is the pledge on the side of God, and the obligation on the side of man.

The call, given and received, creates an intimate fellowship. The One who calls is holy, and by the mighty ministry of the Spirit, he who shares the fellowship is transformed into the same holiness. All fellowship with God is productive of spiritual likeness. If we gaze into His face, we shall be illumined with the light of His countenance. "Beholding as in a mirror the glory of the Lord, we are transformed into the same image." We absorb the glory of the Lord. We become transfigured by it.

Let us mark the breadth of the transformation process. We are to be holy "in all manner of living." The pervasive power of the Spirit is to influence every walk of life and every part of the walk. The transfiguring energy is to inhabit even trifles, and the commonplaces of life are to be illumined by the indwelling of the eternal light. We shall grow in grace, putting on more and more of the beauty of Him in whose fellowship we dwell.

"Because it is written, Ye shall be holy; for I am holy." That is more than an imperative; it is an evangel. It is a command which enshrines a promise. Because God is holy we have the promise of holiness. Therefore we may sing with the Psalmist, in words which at the first hearing may appear strange, "We give thanks at the remembrance of His holiness."

Wherefore, with this glorious provision for our life, with resources more than adequate for our tasks, with power that even surpasses the grandeur of our calling, let us "gird up the loins" of our mind, be sober, and set our hope perfectly on the grace that is being brought unto us at the revelation of Jesus Christ.

The Chest by the Altar

MONDAY. II Kings 12:9. "The priest took a chest and bored a hole in the lid of it and set it beside the altar." There is a vital relationship between the alms box and the altar. The offering is not a break in worship but a part of the proceeding. The "collection for the saints" is not an interruption but an inspiration. Wealth is a stewardship. Possessions are a trusteeship. Accumulations are a challenge. Blessings are an obligation.

In Old Testament times the Jew needed no reminder to pay his tithe by press-agenting and pleading propaganda as we do in these New Testament times. To the member of the synagogue, the tenth of his income given to the work of the Lord was part and parcel of his religion. It was an unwritten covenant. He who has nothing to give is poor; but he who has, and refuses to bestow, is poor indeed. The first may still be in grace, but the second is in disgrace. The measure of our appreciation to God for blessings received is not how much we give but the amount we have left. The reason why so many have so little is because too many have too much.

Mrs. A. had a beautiful garden of nasturtiums. But she refused to cut her flowers. They were a riot of color for a few weeks, but in late summer, her blooms began to fade and the garden lost its beauty. There was nothing but stems, for the garden had bloomed itself to death. Her neighbor, however, who also had a beautiful garden of the same kind of flowers, cut lavish quantities and distributed them to the sick and shut-ins and those who had little to cheer them. She never thought of saving her plants. But the more she cut the more she had; the more she gave the more she received.

The Dead Sea is dead because it has no outlet. That life too is dead that has no overflow. The best life is not mercenary but missionary. We are not to corner our blessings, but bless our corners. "He that giveth, let him do it with liberality." R. B.

The Measure of God

TUESDAY. Isa. 55:8. "My thoughts are not your thoughts, neither are your ways my ways." In all the satirical literature of the world you will find nothing finer than Isaiah's picture of the idol-maker in his shop. (Isaiah 44:10-19.) He has brought a cedar log from the forest, of straight grain, knotless and of sound heart, "a log that will not rot." He stretches out his rule, and marks it with a line and makes it "according to the beauty of a man." He surveys it with speculation in his eyes; for this god must not be over-tall to pass under the lintel nor over-broad to be carried between the side-posts. He projects the figure with compass and chalk-line; and, finding the beam too long, cuts it in two. Then he hews it with an adze and fashions it with a chisel.

But, anon, the pangs of hunger are upon him; whereupon he gathers up the chips, kindles them and therewith bakes his food. Now he stands before the fire, rubbing his hands and saying, "Aha! I am warm." And, having satisfied his hunger, he turns toward the half-graven image, the residue of the cedar log, and cries, "Deliver me, for thou art my god!"

If we are ever to find God we must get altogether out of the workshop. Its walls are too close, its air too stifling. Out into the illimitable open, therefore, let us go; out under the lofty canopy where we may measure him in vast dimensions. For our God is a great God above all gods! No golden band can compass His brow; no girdle bind His loins; no measuring line be laid upon Him. The faintest silhouette of Him is "high as heaven, what canst thou do; deeper than hell, what canst thou know? The measure thereof is longer than the earth and broader than the sea!"

D. J. B.

Diety Robed as Humanity

WEDNESDAY. John 16:28. "I came forth from the Father and am come into the world; again I leave the world and go to the Father." This wonderful verse expresses the deity and eternity of Christ so strongly that the disciples replied, "Now speakest thou plainly and in no proverb."

Jesus did not begin His existence when He came into this world, born of the Virgin Mary; neither did He leave this world at death, as we do. He came forth from the glory He had with the Father before the world was. He came into this world robed in the form of humanity made flesh, that He might dwell among us, show us the Father and die for our salvation. He left this world to return to the Father, not at death, but after His resurrection and ascension, that He might continue His everlasting existence as Creator, Redeemer and King of all kingdoms. He no doubt referred to His diety so that the disciples would not be overwhelmed with sorrow at His departure. He was going away to make fuller preparation for their coming. The disciples understood that Jesus is the second person in the Godhead and that the Third Person was coming, to comfort and clothe them with power, that they might be witnesses of Him till His second coming. Death that had meant desolation now meant a fuller life. Truly they had beheld the glory of the only begotten of the Father. E. W. C.

Not by Bread Alone

THURSDAY. Matt. 4:4. "Man shall not live by bread alone." There is a so-called economic theory of history. It holds that the rise and decay of nations, the organization of great movements, race migrations, the discovery and colonization of new countries, wars and treaties of peace, are dictated by materialistic forces. Satan seems to affirm the economic theory of conduct. "You are hungry? Then eat." Christ answers by quoting Moses, "Man shall not live by bread alone." The economic theory of history is really a part of a greater philosophy, the mechanistic theory of life—the doctrine

Petition

By Margaret E. Sangster

THIS is my prayer, O God, that I
May fully live my life!
That I may face, without a cry,
The bitterness and strife,
And that, in sweet humility,
Each small success I'll meet—
And that, at last, my heart may be Bowed down before Thy feet.

Grant that I may enjoy each day
The sunshine and the shower—
Grant that I go, gallant and gay,
To meet my darkest hour.
Grant that I know my share of love,
Of mingled pain and peace,
And—when my soul has gone above—
The blessing of release!

that we act only as we are acted upon by material forces. This excludes God from life.

Jesus came to combat this theory of life and to set up a spiritual theory—the doctrine that life is bounded on every side by spiritual forces. In the long run Christ's philosophy wins. History vindicates it. In the end the stars fight against everything that is ideally wrong. "Truth crushed to earth shall rise again."

The economic theory of history breaks down in three great periods: during the Crusades, at the settlement of Plymouth, and in the great World War. The Crusades were purely idealistic. The settlement at Plymouth was the triumph of a great religious enthusiasm. The great World War, whatever may have been its causes, came to an end as it did because the heart of the world protested against "embattled wickedness." God forbid that we should forget so soon the spirit that animated our soldiers—the spirit that won the war. This is the statement of it: "Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God"—by liberty and justice, by faith and honor, by truth and conscience, which are God's words for the saving of men.

The Key of the Street

FRIDAY. Mark 12:37. "And the common people heard him gladly." Gilbert Chesterton said of Charles Dickens, that he, beyond any other in English letters, had the "key of the street." It is true that the master of wit and pathos knew the common people, and was their interpreter and champion.

Jesus Christ was the first to see the glory in the commonplace and discern the halo on the ordinary. The Son of God possessed the "key of the street" and handed it down to leaders and seers through the centuries. Emerson made good use of this open sesame to the heart throbs and pulse beats of the rank and file when he sang:

"'Tis not in the high stars alone
Nor in the cup of budding flowers,
Nor in the redbreast's mellow tone,
Nor in the bow that smiles in showers,
But in the mud and seum of things
There alway, alway something sings."

The Pharisees called the multitude "Mob." The Christ called them "Harvest." Even the disciples, thinking themselves members of the "privileged class," requested the Master to send them away. Jesus, the "man of the people," invited them to come. Main Street has always been more interesting than Fifth Avenue. While the Four Hundred are not to be overlooked, the Four Million must not be forgotten. Jesus trusted the common man uncommonly, and saw the lily in the muck, the jewel in the mire, the angel in the rough stone. With humble fishermen and wayside tax-gatherers He put in motion the energetics of the Kingdom, and gave emphasis to the values of the Church with its service and ministry.

From the "stream of life" and the "crowded ways" have come our great men and women, our leaders and thinkers. This is a matter of record, and the pages of history and biography are eloquent of the fact. Put the New Testament in the hands of Mary Jones or Johnny Smith, so that the grace of God may find lodgment in their hearts, and the problems of the future shall be solved. All great movements are from the ground up and all progress is tidal—a ground swell. Like our Lord let us become the discoverers of the individual and, in wavering Peters and uncertain Thomases, find rock-like qualities and sterling convictions. The gold is there, and when we dig and delve we shall find it.

Children of God

SATURDAY. I John 3:1. "That we should be called the sons of God." Who calls us so? As for ourselves, we would scarcely dare. As for the world, typified by the brother of the prodigal looking in at the window upon the festivities at the father's house, it refuses to characterize us in any such way. It is only the Father who calls us sons.

And we humbly and gratefully assent, because "we have received the Spirit of adoption whereby we cry, 'Abba, Father!'" For so it is written, "The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit that we are the children of God."

Here is the secret of "assurance." There is no assurance but the assurance of faith, a loving faith that lays hold on God as our Father and on Christ as "the first-born among many brethren," by whom we are brought home from the far country and restored to the birthright which we had forfeited through sin. Only so can we join with Wesley in singing for joy,

"The Spirit answers to the blood,
And tells us we are born of God." D. J. B.

The Automobile Problem Arrives

And How One Family's Solution of the Ensuing Perplexities Is Worked Out

By A MERE MAN

I DON'T pretend to be any better financial manager than other mere men of my size in this town, but I do think I have managed pretty well to bring up a family of five, send one to college, keep all of them decently well clothed and more than fairly well fed and housed, and save a little money, all on an income of about $3,500 a year, a good slice of which has been paid out for old debts and one unfortunate oil investment. I will not say just how much I have in the bank at present, but it will be enough for this narrative to say that I have a little money laid by, carry a reasonable amount of insurance, and as a family we have of late years lived quite comfortably within our means, owing to the fact that we are not extravagant, and have been brought up to pretty plain living.

But a little over a year ago the younger boy began to raise the question, quite often, of getting an automobile. He said a good many of the boys in the High School had cars, and he did not see why we couldn't have one.

Now, I don't mind saying that the matter of buying a car had been in my own mind for some time. Most of my business friends had cars. There were still a few like myself, who had not cared to own one, and who preferred to walk down to business for the sake of the exercise. But the great majority preferred to ride, and it was a small number of men in our town who were able to buy cars (or acted as if they were) who did not have one.

THERE was one other thing that made me listen to the boy as he kept up the talk about a car, and that was the fact that I had joined a golf club, and found the distance to the grounds by the street cars was almost a bar to my playing, as it took so long to make the trip. Once in a while a member would invite me out in his car and take me home; but it made me feel uneasy to accept such a courtesy too often, and several times I had debated with myself the problem of owning a car of my own.

"I don't see why we can't be like other folks," the boy would say. "Everyone has a car nowadays. We are not keeping up with the times not to have one."

"What times are you talking about?" I would say, speaking with some knowledge of the subject. "Do you mean hard times? Those are the times some of the car owners are having with their cars, I gather from occasional remarks I hear from the owners."

"Well, father," the boy would go on, using an argument that really carried weight with me, coming as it did right after his mother's break-down, "if we had a car, say a five passenger" (and here the young fellow named over a catalogue list of cars that showed he had been going into the matter pretty deeply), "we could all go out, and summer is coming on and mother would enjoy it, wouldn't you?"

"Of course I—" she said almost before she thought, as it seemed to me. "That is, I don't know that your father can afford it. They are very expensive things, cars are."

"But hospitals and doctors cost more. And you need the outdoors, and all that," he went on.

I may as well say right here that the older boy had not expressed himself on this subject, very much to my surprise. I don't know to this day why he had never wanted a car. I think it was because he really had an unusually large amount of plain common sense and had figured out carefully that I was not able to own and operate a car on my income, without too much expense, and he had an unusual gift for a certain kind of shrewd financiering. As for the Girl, it may seem strange to you that she had not been asking for a car long before this. But she had never asked me to buy one, and I knew her reason, one that will surprise you some when I come to mention the Girl Problem.

IT WAS the argument (if it was an argument) of the mother's needing the outdoor life that finally decided the car matter. We had a family council, and talked the thing over from every angle. So we finally agreed on a car (I will not mention the make), which according to the agent combined all the advantages and none of the defects of all the other makes, and after going through the usual experimenting and of learning to drive the thing and learning the names of some of the more easy parts of the mechanism, we entered into possession of an automobile, and as the ancient language of a certain legal document has it, "into all the perquisites and appurtenances thereof." And let me say right here that as time went on the "appurtenances thereof" took on many shapes such as "gas," "repairs," "blow-outs," "punctures," "tires," "engine trouble," "radio-tor leaks," "broken-down batteries," "short circuits," "carbon cylinders," and "carburetor-needs-regulating."

But all that became prominent at a later period. At first, I am sure it is a fact that the family enjoyed the new car and we all had many happy rides together in it. I noted particularly during that period how much pleasure my wife seemed to get out of the drives we took around town and out into the country. She was too timid to try to drive the thing alone, but the Girl learned, and the two had more than one long drive together, once to visit an old school friend in a neighboring town.

BUT gradually, I can't just exactly say how the whole thing came about, some serious matters came up in connection with the car which I have learned since are quite common with many other families in town.

I don't refer specially to the expense of keeping the machine going, although as the thing got older it seemed to me it grew wonderfully liable to run up bills of expense for a dozen different necessities. If it was not tires it was tubes. If the engine went all right, the magneto was out of order. If the spark plugs did not miss, the gas seemed to be always missing. However, I will say that the younger boy was willing to tinker at the different parts, and on the whole I am inclined to think he mended almost as much as he spoiled in trying.

But it was concerning his part in the automobile incident in our family that the really serious troubles arose. The cost of feeding the animal and keeping him from falling to pieces was of small account by the side of what happened in other ways.

You will remember the Boy had mentioned the fact that a number of the High School boys had cars. After getting our car I drove down-town to my business with it quite regularly, and often passed by the High School grounds on the way. One morning I counted 47 cars parked around the High School block. That seemed a pretty good number, considering the fact that our town has less than 40,000 population. I mentioned the number to the family one evening at meal time. But it did not seem to make any special impression. The younger boy grinned, and said, "Well, the cars are not used during business hours down-town. The fellows might as well have them up around the school."

I did not know all he meant, but had occasion to, as time went on.

Gradually I began to lose some of my first enthusiasm for the car, and the boy seemed to want it oftener. I have always had a horror of getting too stout and fat. I found that I was missing my old walk down-town in the morning, and when my wife hinted that I showed signs of a double chin, that was the beginning of the end of my use of the car for riding to business. When the boy had to hurry to make school, owing to a late breakfast, it seemed natural for him to jump into the car with his sister and whirl down to the High School building. In time, the car became one of the 47 that regularly parked around the school during school hours. The only thing that I insisted on was that my wife should have her rides when she wanted them. But I have found out since that many an afternoon when she should have been enjoying the use of the car, the boy was off with it riding around with his schoolmates.

THIS sort of thing grows up by degrees. Any number of fathers and mothers could tell similar tales of automobiles in the family. And to make this story one of the tabloid variety, one evening quite late, the Boy's mother came into my den with a real look of anxiety on her face.

"John has not come in yet."

I looked at my watch. It was half-past eleven.

"He is out with the car," my wife said, and the way she said it made me realize that there was more serious matter coming.

"I'm afraid," she faltered, "that he is out with that" (she named one of the most reckless automobile drivers in the High School) and—"She waited a moment and then broke down."

I waited, for it had only just begun to dawn on me what she was trying to say. But my wife is a woman of courage and I was not so very much surprised when she calmed down and said, at last, "They went by the house this afternoon and there were two girls with the boys. I couldn't tell who they were. But they are not back."

My first feeling was one of deep anger. Of course I knew, as do most American fathers whose sons drive their cars to school and college, that the young folks of this generation live lives of great freedom nowadays. But—"I'll wait up for him," I said grimly. "He knows that the one rule I have made for him is that the car must be in by ten at the latest."

I never think back to that night without a feeling of dread. It was after half-past two o'clock in the morning when I heard the noise of the car as it came up the drive by the side of the house to the little garage I had built at the end of the lot. I waited until I heard the door shut, and the boy came slowly along to the front of the house. Then I went downstairs and opened the door.

HIS face was very white and I shall never forget the look of misery on it. He was crying as he came in, and his clothes were covered with grime and oil.

"We broke down way out by the river bend, father," he said, leaning up against the door. "We had a bad blow-out, and there wasn't a house for miles from which we could telephone. Warren and I have been working over the tires all this time to get back."

"Where are those girls?" I said, and I am frank to say I was angry all over, after waiting up all that time.

"We told them to walk back to the last house we passed, and telephone while we worked over the car. They got frightened and didn't go but part way. We took them up on our way in. They are at home."

Well, I felt some relieved over that, and yet I was so stirred up that I don't know just what I might have said if at that moment the Boy's mother hadn't come down-stairs. She had not been asleep, of course, and when she came down, the Boy, who was still leaning up against the door which he had left open, looked up for a moment, and then he did what changed my feeling toward him, and I think it had a good deal to do with what followed the next morning at our family council. He went, with a cry of real relief and as if he needed his mother's arms about him, right into them, and she held him close, as your mother has held you when you had done something you ought not, and were truly sorry for it.

I don't need to tell much of anything more about what came on next, but in the morning, at the breakfast-table, according to a common custom in our family we held a council over the whole automobile business.

THE Boy was pretty serious, and for that matter we all were. I stated the case for and against the car, and we finally agreed to adopt these rules and regulations to govern its use:

The mother to have the benefit of rides whenever the boys or the girl could take her out without interfering with their regular school duties.

Dad to use the car to get to the golf grounds, or go fishing, or take visiting friends out when it was necessary to do the friendly act.

No automobile riding with the girls at night, unless the sister or mother or some of the teachers were along. This rule seemed a little hard to the younger boy. He said it was a rule not observed by any other family, but after his experience he was not inclined to object seriously. And besides this is not the account of some other family's way of dealing with the automobile problem, but it is ours.

The whole family to use the car as a thing of real pleasure. And as far as possible also use it to take out friends who were not able to buy cars.

I don't remember that there were any other special rules agreed on by the council, but as time has gone on, I think it is quite safe to say that the car has proved to be a real blessing to us, and from what some of the old ladies in the Old Ladies' Home say, when the Girl has run down there to take three or four of them out for an hour or two Saturday afternoons, I am sure we feel quite justified in keeping it, especially after lending its use. I hope I am not too strict in my regulations, and events as they are coming on, seem to prove to me and to my wife that the regulations are quite sensible.

And I want to say as I close, that my wife is getting so much good out of the rides she gets, that I am very glad I did not do what I had made up my mind to do just before she came down-stairs that night at half-past two. I was just about to tell the Boy that the car would be advertised for sale before another night. But there was another way of settling the problem, and I am inclined to think that the sight of the boy, who was truly sorry, as his mother's arms went around him, kept me from turning the garage into a chicken house. My wife can't run the car, but she surely does know how to make the wheels of this family, including the Mere Man, run straight.

A Very Good Habit

ANTHONY TROLLOPE, on one occasion, was talking to a group of young men on the joys of good literature.

"Now my young friends," he said, "with reference to this habit of reading, I make bold to tell you that it is your pass to the greatest, the purest, and the most perfect pleasure that God has prepared for His creatures."

He said a lot more in illustration of his point, and nothing to which any of us can take exception. For can you think of any habit that gives you more comfort and pleasure than a good book or a good magazine, a cozy chair and a mellow light flooding over your shoulder?

As Lady Montagu once remarked: "No entertainment is so cheap as reading, nor any pleasure so lasting."

Agreeing heartily with this sentiment, isn't it surprising that more persons do not acquire the habit? We know one busy business man who makes it an invariable rule to read for one hour before he turns out his light at night, no matter the time he reaches his home. He calls it the best hour of the twenty-four because he stores enough inspiration from it to last him through all his problems and perplexities of another day.

Of course not every one is able to devote even one hour a day to entire forgetfulness of external things, but once the habit of reading is acquired, as you can testify from experience, what time you can devote to it is not to be bought lightly. And then, the less time one has for reading the more necessary it becomes to make a choice of material that offers the widest latitude of information, entertainment and inspiration in the most compact form. All three of these elements are necessary if the mind is to be well rounded, and they are all found in the Christian Herald.

You know the Christian Herald and some of its many accomplishments. Don't you, also, know some one who would find joy in reading it? If so, why not call their attention to this suggestion, and the price, $2.00 for a year's fifty-two issues? It will be the best investment they ever made.

Paul Preparing for World Conquest

International Sunday-School Lesson for August 21

Acts 15:1 to 16:5

By REV. SAMUEL D. PRICE, D.D.

EIGHTEEN hundred years elapsed before the Church began really to comprehend the scope of the Great Commission as given by Jesus Christ when He commanded that the Gospel should be taken into all the world. Meanwhile there was a growing meaning to those never-revoked marching orders. Peter soon went to the home of Cornelius, the centurion, in Caesarea and to the despised in Samaria. Philip ministered unto the eunuch of Ethiopia. Barnabas and Saul had made the first extended missionary journey. From now until October 2, the second great journey of Paul will be studied, in which he, with Silas, Luke and others, goes on a still longer tour in Asia and then crosses into Europe. Since then tens of thousands have responded to the call of their Lord and have gone literally everywhere in this great world.

Christian statesmen is a name that can be well applied to men and women who direct the work of the churches. The demands made upon them are far greater than the average person appreciates. The history of Church councils fills libraries. Leaders with marvellous ability have faced and settled most vexatious questions. It is a simple matter to recite the Apostles' Creed, for example, and while doing so few think of the study, discussion and even controversy required to produce that statement. The first great Church Council was the one held at Jerusalem in the year 50 A.D., as recorded in Acts 15. Those early Church fathers could take their places with later leaders such as Arius, Athanasius, Chrysostom, Luther, Calvin, Knox and the Wesleys. (If any of these men are unfamiliar, turn to your encyclopedia and get at least some of the facts of the history they had part in making.)

That Council at Jerusalem began because some Jews wanted to establish a mould through which must be passed the life of each person who would be a follower of Jesus Christ. Circumcision was demanded before one could claim to be saved. Over against this, Peter, Paul and others had seen salvation wrought by the Holy Spirit in those who were uncircumcised Gentiles. Some at Jerusalem were so zealous as formalists that they were down to Antioch and insisted that their creed was the divine one. Paul and Barnabas could not change these apostles of circumcision by declaring the gracious fruits from their first journey; so the Church at Antioch advised that the whole question be studied with other leaders at Jerusalem. This suited Paul, for he could have the joy of witnessing to his Lord as he journeyed through Phoenicia and Samaria. It was an opportunity for a sermon 300 miles long.

THE value of arbitration is clearly seen as the incidents of that Council at Jerusalem are studied. Read also Galatians 2:1-10. Ponder on the facts presented by the preachers who had been witnesses of the saving work of the Holy Spirit. They won by their irrefutable proofs. Note that the four points in the final action come from a compromise, both sides yielding in non-essentials in the matter of foods. Considering the times and the ancient customs of the Jews, each point in the agreement was a major one. Factions became friends and all went forward with their world-winning program.

As for Paul, wherever he went, offerings were taken up for the poor Jews who were related to the mother church in Jerusalem. James, the brother of Jesus, John, Peter, and Titus are named as members of that Council. Both Peter and James made convincing addresses, after Paul had told his story of spiritual victories. Judas and Silas were sent back with those who came from Antioch, that a formal reply might be rendered. The work of the Kingdom, which is always the supreme thing, was helped and not hindered. The Holy Spirit surely presided at that ecumenical congress.

When a person prays "Thy kingdom come" with a world-wide meaning, he is always eager to help in answering his own prayers. While Paul and Barnabas could and did preach and teach in Antioch, it was not long before Paul conferred with the companion of his former long journey about another extended gospel preaching tour. Barnabas was equally ready and desired to give to his nephew, Mark, another opportunity. To this Paul objected. He, too, wanted to see Mark "come back," but not necessarily in his former position. These Christian brethren just argued the matter right out, then and there, and agreed to separate. When Barnabas insisted that he would not go without Mark, Paul told him that this great world was so big and the need for workers so great, that he should take Mark and go to Cyprus, while Silas would be his own companion in visiting those cities in the highlands to which Mark declined to go on the former journey.

There is no value in trying to settle the right in that "sharp contention." It is enough to observe that Mark made good in his later work, and that Paul writes most kindly about him and says to Timothy in the after years, "Bring Mark with thee." An oft-used definition of "Grow" is worth considering when there is a tendency to stop by reason of some interruption or difficulty—Go Right On Working!

After another consecration prayer meeting in the church at Antioch, Paul and Silas start for the Cilician Gates that they may encourage the churches and converts in Derbe, Lystra and Iconium. The reported hardships experienced by Paul and Barnabas do not disturb Silas. There are souls to be helped and God will go with him. He expected hardships and the results were well worth all that they might cost.

TRAINING for leadership is the constant work of the Sunday school. The officers and teachers of today are not building satisfactorily unless they are working so that there may always be others at hand, sufficiently equipped, to take their places. At Lystra, Paul is greeted by young Timothy, who was doubtless converted when Paul was there before. Timothy had been preparing himself for service. The men in Lystra spoke well of Timothy, as did those in Iconium. He was establishing a good reputation as well as a fine character. Paul wants another companion and helper and invites Timothy to go with him wherever the call of the Holy Spirit may summon, and Timothy accepts with eagerness. The life of a person is shown in part by the kind of letters that are written to him. Test Timothy by this and read the two epistles Paul sent to him.

Thousands are now waiting for colleges to open, that they may take up or continue their collegiate course. Many of these (and one may be you, dear reader) have not chosen their life-work. Many Timothies are needed right now for Christian work both at home and abroad. God is calling you, not only to give your life to Him, but also your life-service.

There was a mighty appeal in the address by Rev. S. M. Zwemer, D. D., at the Christian Endeavor convention as he sounded out the challenge of the need of the Moslem World, with more than 200,000,000 who deny the fact of Jesus Christ. Dr. Zwemer closed with an impassioned appeal, naming each denomination, urging the young people to enlist for service in making their Lord known. Paul, Silas, Timothy, Barnabas and Mark blazed the way of the missionary trail which is becoming now a great highway everywhere. Will you take the ever-blessed Gospel to those who do not know Him?

Jerry of Justamere Cabin

as I came up. "What have you done with the little boy I gave you to look after two or three months ago? Who is this you are trying to palm off on me?"

I hugged him around the neck and he pretended to have all the wind squeezed out of him.

"Jerry, I'm so glad to see you looking so fine I hardly know how to hold it," he continued. "We'll celebrate after a little while, but first I have some business with the president of this Invincible Trust Company."

"Let me go with you," I asked. "I came down early this morning to see him and I've been waiting for a chance ever since."

So when my father and Major Bassel entered the private office of the president, I was admitted with them. The strange man, who carried an enormous traveling bag, stayed outside.

There were no introductions, because Mr. Blair, the president, knew both father and Major Bassel quite well, and I suppose I was taken for granted. My father, who, you will remember, is a lawyer by profession, opened the conversation.

"We've come to clear up this mysterious disappearance of the valuables entrusted to my client, Mr. Bassel, on the morning of June 22, 1917, Mr. Blair," said father.

"I sincerely hope that you can clear it up," said Mr. Blair.

"Before we say anything, I believe you ought to call Mr. Persmann in and give him a chance to make a full statement," said father. "I may as well say frankly that the accusations we shall make will implicate him very seriously."

"Are you sure that you have something more than suspicion," asked Mr. Blair. "This matter has already been gone into quite thoroughly with Mr. Persmann, and I do not like to subject an employee of so long standing to an inquisition that is not based on something better than suspicion."

I THOUGHT then that it was time for me to speak. I did not know what father and Major Bassel might think. Surely they could not have heard Persmann talking to me yesterday. But perhaps he had talked to others while under similar spells. Anyway it was my duty to do what I could to show his good intentions.

"Please let me say something," I interrupted. "I came down here today by agreement with Mr. Persmann. He told me some very important things yesterday. I won't say what they were, because it was his intention to tell them to Mr. Blair today, and he is the one to speak. But before anyone says anything more please give him a chance to speak."

"I will send for him," said Mr. Blair. And now, thought I, we shall see what we shall see, and these grown folks will agree, after Persmann has repeated the tale he told me yesterday, that Jerry has had a great deal to do with clearing up this problem, and bringing it to a happy ending.

But my complacency received a great shock the minute Persmann stepped into the room. He did not come in meek and repentant. Not a bit of it. He came in raving.

"I saw you come in with that boy," he shouted. "I know what you are up to. You have been putting together foolish things that he has told you and have come here with a pack of lies to Mr. Blair. But it won't do. I deny everything. I—"

"Wait a minute! Wait a minute!"

The voice that interrupted came from the stranger with the enormous traveling bag, who had followed Persmann into the room. He now rested this bag on the floor in the middle of the room, and stood looking squarely at Mr. Persmann.

"Name is Wells, gentlemen," said he. "Before Mr. Persmann gets to denying so very much, let me ask a question or two. You have been off the job for a week, isn't it, Mr. Persmann? Yes, I thought so. What you been doing all that week?"

"Attending to my own business," snapped Persmann.

But Mr. Blair added: "I see no harm in saying that in an accident at the lake, near his cottage, Mr. Persmann lost a satchel containing some valuable papers. He has been making an effort to recover the satchel."

"That's right, is it, Persmann?" asked Mr. Wells.

Persmann nodded a surly assent. "Very well!" said Mr. Wells.

HE LIFTED his big traveling bag from the floor to a table, released the clasps with a couple of sharp clicks and threw open the bag to its widest. Then with a dramatic gesture he suddenly pulled forth the satchel that we all supposed to be at the bottom of the lake!

"Exhibit A!" said Mr. Wells. "Can you identify that satchel, Mr. Persmann?"

"It's mine!" exclaimed Persmann. "It's the satchel I lost in the lake. It is my personal property and I claim possession of it."

He reached forward to grab the satchel, but the big hand of Mr. Wells interposed.

"Not so fast," said Mr. Wells. "Not so fast. You are quite sure it is your satchel?"

"Yes, and neither you nor any other man has the right to keep it from me."

I could see that Persmann was getting worked up to a terrible pitch of temper. The maniacal look that he had worn the day before, in the woods, was returning.

"Perhaps not," said Mr. Wells. "But the law, now, the law might keep it from you. And you see, Mr. Persmann, I'm the law. I'm deputy sheriff of this county."

"Do you know the contents of that satchel, Mr. Persmann?" asked Major Bassel.

"No. I don't know what's in it now," he replied, in a great rage. "If it's been in your hands you may have put in anything that you had a mind."

I felt a chill at hearing this. It looked like a weak place for the Major. If the satchel had been in his possession how could he prove that he had not prepared its contents.

BUT Mr. Wells interrupted again. "Don't be hasty, now; don't be hasty," he said. "I reckon I told you I was deputy sheriff. I'm the law; that's what I am. The Major, he respects the law. He called me on the phone, one night, a week ago, and he says, 'Wells, I wish you'd come up to my place to-night.' When I came there he tells me how you've had an accident and lost your satchel. 'I'd like to get hold of that satchel, Wells,' says he. 'I'm a pretty fair diver and I think I can get it, but there's legal reasons why I want you to see me try it, and why I want you to open the satchel and see what's in it!'"

"Why, Major Bassel," I shouted. "Bully for you! You went and got that yourself that very night."

"Yes, boy," continued Wells. "He said some real smart boy who saw the upset had developed brains enough to pick up some landmarks, and he knew about where to go. He's some diver, the Major is, believe me. Third time up he comes with the bag. Not more than five minutes, altogether."

"You've had my property a week!" raged Persmann. "And you talk about law. I'll show you some law!"

"And if you try it you'll find everything perfectly legal," replied Mr. Wells. "The deputy sheriff of this county examined the contents of this bag in the presence of another county official, sealed it up, and placed it in the safe in the sheriff's office that very night. It's just been waiting a few days while Major Bassel could get in touch with his legal adviser, the gentleman on my right. Don't you make any mistake about everything being done perfectly legal."

PERSMANN started to reply, made a dash for the bag, and fell forward on the table in a wild convulsion. The four men rushed to his aid, and I heard my father say, "Get a doctor!"

I rushed across the street to a big building in which some doctors had offices and came back in a few minutes with a young man who was the first doctor to be found.

Persmann, now stretched on the floor, was apparently conscious yet seemed bereft of the power of speech and unable to make an intelligent response to any inquiries.

"I'll admit that I don't understand this kind of case," said the young doctor. "He's had a severe mental and nervous shock, you say, and the reaction of shocks of such a kind is shown in many different ways. Rest is his most urgent need. And I'd say that you'd better put him under the treatment of a specialist."

When he had gone I made my second contribution to the consultation by telling all about how Persmann had acted and what he had said the day before.

"You see he really was worried almost insane about this thing and he really did want to square it up. Major Bassel knows what's the matter with him, don't you, Major. It's like shell-shock, isn't it? And if you need a specialist, why not let Major Bassel be the one. He knows all about it."

They all laughed a little except the Major. He looked quite serious. "If he'd take my suggestions as kindly as you have, Jerry, I'd like to take care of him," said the Major.

"That friend of yours could help him, Major," I said.

"He surely could," said the Major. "And now that I'm so happy myself, I don't know of a more practical thing that I could do than to try to help this poor fellow. The treatment that can cure the shell-shock produced by the deviltries of war can cure the shell-shock that comes from other deviltries, too."

IT SEEMS scarcely possible that all those things happened a whole year ago. But this is another August 31, so it is a full year.

I have been at Justamere Cabin most of the summer. When father saw how much it had done for me he was so pleased that he declared we would live at the lake as much of the time as possible. He proposed to build a fine, new house at once. But I objected. I told him Justamere Cabin seemed to suit me just about right, and I had some ideas for a few improvements that I would like to work on, all by myself, a little later on.

Major and Mrs. Bassel built a new house, though. They built on the site of the deserted cabin and put up a gem of a little place. You see, getting that $23,000 back made them feel rich enough to have a home once more. And being given such a responsible position in the Invincible Trust Company right next to Mr. Blair, the president, the Major was able to maintain a nice home, too.

I have a new canoe, the most beautiful craft that ever floated on the waters of the lake. It was given by Major Bassel to "the boy who helped him recover his place." I gave Invincible II to Harold, who also has the boat.

Yes, Harold and his sister both came when we sent for them. They lived in the cottage and took care of Mr. Persmann during the long fight back to health and sanity which he made under Major Bassel's supervision.

It was hard for us to believe that Persmann ever would be a real good fellow that one could actually be glad to have around, but he proved it by the way he treated Harold and his sister, and when he got well and volunteered to teach me how to catch big channel cat, like the one that ran away with the boat. I discovered that we had much in common. We count him one of the colony now, and he is younger and fatter and less inclined to stoop and to scowl.

Kent was away at school all winter, but he has been at home for a jolly good season this summer. Tomorrow he starts back to school and I am going with him.

And Kate is still Kate. She is a year older, but so am I, and I have made such a big jump in height and breadth that I pretend to treat her as a little girl. Now that I am big and strong she makes great sport of my "shell-shock" experiences.

She still enjoys spouting little rhymes. We have just had a club dinner in honor of the day and she prepared place cards for each of us. This is mine:

"Shell-shocked Jerry, bright and merry;
Bless his sweet young face.
He'll sit here, the little dear,
This shall be his place.
Soon our joy will turn to sorrow,
Jerry goes away tomorrow;
But today, from shell-shock free,
We'll be happy as can be."

The canning club work has always attracted great attention in the Southern States, so that people have come to look upon it as the only field where the home demonstration agent functioned. She has, however, touched the homes in the South far more intimately and helpfully than casual examination reveals. From canning one vegetable, the tomato, the girls—and women, too, because gradually the mothers became interested—have gone through the garden, orchard, poultry yard, barnyard, kitchen house and household to the front lawn.

The introduction of new plants suitable for growing in special localities, has been part of the home demonstration agent's program. The Spanish sweet pepper, or pimiento, has come into the diet in many sections far more rapidly than the tomato did at first. Relishes, pickles, and chutneys containing both peppers and tomatoes have proved easy to sell, and have brought a good income to club girls. At the present time the encouragement of the broom-corn industry in North Carolina is a typical instance of supplying a real market with something actually needed. Broom corn is not grown to the extent needed to meet the requirements of the grade.

meated fish abound, and corn, celery, onions, peppers, and tomatoes may be had. In the near future "burgoo," that dish of mystery peculiar to big Kentucky gatherings, will be captured in cans and marketed by clubs of Southern women and girls conducted by the home demonstration agents. Emphasis has been placed on the production of a standardized product.

In all the projects there is constant need for side work on other home problems. Equipment in the kitchen is improved. New interest is aroused in every branch of home making. Electricity is gradually coming to be recognized as the best servant for the home. Poultry work is in great demand. The program for the immediate future includes everything which has to do with the house itself, such as remodeling, building, equipping with labor-saving conveniences, and suitable furnishings. It also deals with the improvement and beautification of the exterior surroundings of the farm home. The idea is steadily to be cultivated that investment in the comfort, beauty, health, and efficiency of the farm home and the rural community is a wise and legitimate expenditure, and perhaps the only means of stopping the drift of young people to the city.

Farm women for the most part love the country and do not want to give up its freedom for city life. What they do want is normal living and working conditions in the farm home. As one woman said when a survey was made to ascertain the real needs of rural families, "The country offers greater opportunity for satisfying life than the city, and country women have as great capacity as city women for the enjoyment of life, but are more handicapped with routine which absorbs their time and strength."

small territorially, great in spirit and accomplishment.

William Tell is a man of the mountains. Whether a mythical character or not he is certainly typical of the most democratic, liberty-loving people of Europe. If you do not believe this, go to Switzerland and live among these people for weeks at a time as I have, get the spirit of the glorious Jungfrau or the Dent du Midi into your blood, and you will acknowledge that the "strength of the hills" and the majesty of cloud-capped ranges have something to do with the making of a man and a nation. Reverence, democracy, love of liberty, these people breathe in with every inspiration.

"But," I hear someone say, "you have not said a word for the little hills some of us love so well."

That would be a sad omission. They may not be "glorious" but they are often the most winsome and charming of all. My mind often goes back to one of them, beautiful Asecutney, on the Vermont side of the Connecticut. Asecutney is only three thousand feet high, a little Benjamin among his brethren farther to the north. But he dominates a rich valley and a lovely, winding river. Almost as symmetrical as Fuji himself, he spreads out his ample foothill robes over a section of the valley in a charming way that always gives one a sense of peace, tranquillity and protection.

I suppose boyhood memories glorify this little mountain in my eyes. How often have I climbed its rugged trail! How delicious the scent of its balsams! How sturdy its rock maples and yellow birches! How sweet the water that gushed out of that wonderful spring two-thirds of the way up!

YOU have some such small mountain of your childhood in mind, dear reader, I doubt not, and, though you may since have gazed on Mt. Blanc or the Himalayas, they have not obscured the beauty of your childhood's friend. Ever since, too, you have loved that Bible verse, "the little hills rejoice on every side."

The little hills of history often stir the deepest memories. The Lion Hill of Belgium which helped to win the Battle of Waterloo; Bunker Hill of Massachusetts, where the spirit of the American Revolution found its altar; Malvern Hill where fraternal blood was shed in the Civil War, and where, in part, freedom for the slaves was achieved, are among the little hills of history. One cannot look upon the great artificial hill near Cracow, reared by the strenuous toil of thousands of patriotic Poles, in honor of their great hero, Kosciuszko, without feeling that it is a noble monument to the love of freedom in a long-oppressed race. Famous Capri, in the Bay of Naples, is simply one lovely hill with splendid roads winding over it.

Then think for a moment of the little hills of the Bible. How large a place they hold in the hearts of Christians! Tabor, Hermon, Horeb, Pisgah, Carmel, even Sinai itself—none of them are vast, towering mountains like the Taurus range of Turkey, but the world can never forget them.

Best loved of all is little Olivet: dwarfed in size though it is, by millions of its brethren throughout the world, it can never be dwarfed in the affections of the followers of Jesus Christ for His blessed feet climbed those rocky slopes. Doubtless He sat under those gnarled olive-trees while the soft breeze fanned His brow heated by the climb. From its summit He looked off to the Dead Sea on one side, and to the temple-crowned city of the other, and, as He came down that hill, on one occasion, and turning a corner of the path, the doomed city broke upon His vision. He cried out in anguish, "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, how oft would I have gathered thy children together, as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not."

With that little hill will forever be associated that pathetic wail over a wilful city, as well as the midnight prayer of the Son of God, while directly at its foot lies Gethsemane, the garden of agony and of betrayal, the beginning of the way to Calvary. No other mountain in this wide world, however majestic it may be, can ever rival the one made glorious by the footsteps and the prayers of the Master—the Mount of Olives.

Power of a Lovable Personality

E. L., C. E., and B. Y. P. U. Ruth 1:14-22 (Lessons from the Book of Ruth)

READ the Book of Ruth carefully. Prepare to tell the story in your own words. It is the story of consistent home religion, the power of example and the romance of devotion.

Naomi lived so fine a life that she made a deep impression on two girls, her daughters-in-law, Ruth and Orpah. When a person lives such a noble life in the home that people of a different nationality and religion come to love her and even want her religion, then that person is worth earnest study. Some people's religion makes them hard to live with. Naomi's religion made her easy to live with. She did not have one set of rules for her church-life and another set of rules for home-life.

If we are to win others to our religion we must not, dare not, ignore the power of example. We have in this a duty toward all with whom we come in contact. Especially is this an obligation laid upon the shoulders of American Christians in their attitude and conduct toward the foreigners who come to our shores. No nation rises above the level of its religion. Henry M. Stanley was convinced after spending some time in Africa that Christianity was truly worth-while, because he judged Christianity by the life of David Livingstone. "The best evidence for Christianity is a Christian."

In his "Holy War" John Bunyan has given us a description of a Mr. Any-thing. No one could ever tell to which side he belonged. Sometimes he was fighting on one side and sometimes on the other side, and when his leg was broken in the fight, the author says that "he who did it wished that it had been his neck." Paul said a very good thing: "Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind." Ruth made a correct choice. She knew "a good thing" when she saw it. She saw the fruits of the religion of Naomi. True she would have had a better choice for a husband back in her own country among the Moabites, but she was under the impression that a good religion like Naomi's was worth more than a husband. She was not that type of a girl who was willing to give up her convictions for a man. The ideal for this age sometimes seems to be a marriage with a maximum of money and a minimum of man.

"There was Orpah, another type of young people," says a writer in Young People's Service. "Orpah loved Naomi with a kissing love, but that does not amount to very much. Sentimental mushiness in religion that kisses and cries and forsakes, that was Orpah. But Ruth's love was the sturdy, true-blue, stalwart kind that sticks and does not give up the real thing for a bauble. That was Ruth, she who gave up personal ends for the sake of religion. Orpah went home. Ruth stayed. The result was, as we have read, Ruth became the mother of a king, but we do not know what became of her sister. Ruth became the ancestress of David and Jesus. This story of Ruth makes us think of the words of the Master, 'Seek ye first the kingdom of God.' Orpah threw religion to the winds. Ruth stayed by Naomi and accepted the religion of the true God when she said, 'Entreat me not to leave thee or to return from following after thee, for whither thou goest, I will go, and where thou lodgest, I will lodge; thy people shall be my people and thy God my God.'"

Like nut meats puffed

Puffed Rice is toasted rice grains puffed to bubbles. Thin as tissue, fragile as snowflakes. The taste is like toasted nuts.

One delightful way of serving is to blend with your morning fruit.

They Want Their cereals puffed, you know

Children want Puffed Grains—no mother can doubt that. These are the food confections.

The texture is enticing—thin, flaky, flimsy, crisp. And no other process develops such flavor.

Then why not serve abundantly, morning, noon and night? There is nothing better for children than whole-grain foods thus fitted to digest.

Prof. Anderson's creations

These are Prof. Anderson's scientific foods. Every food cell is blasted by steam explosion—over 100 million per kernel.

Thus digestion is made easy and complete. Every atom of the whole grain feeds.

That's the object of the process. These bubble grains are fascinating tidbits. They make whole-grain foods tempting. But, above all else, they are also the best-cooked cereals in existence.

Try melted butter on Puffed Rice some morning, instead of cream and sugar.

The milk dish as millions enjoy it

At supper or bedtime serve Puffed Wheat in milk. Nothing else makes the milk dish so inviting. Whole wheat in milk forms a practically complete food. And whole wheat in this form is wholly digestible.

Questions and Answers

MRS. F. G., Wabash, Ind., writes: "Do our own loved ones, who have preceded us to heaven, know what we are doing here on earth?"

It is a great question and a perfectly natural one. Paul recorded his belief in the observation of those who have "passed over" in the famous passage in Heb. 12:1: "Wherefore seeing we also are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses"—If these spectators include some of our own dear ones who died in the faith, it follows logically that they are watchers with a purpose, viz., to observe our progress in the struggle heavenward here on earth, and to send us spiritual encouragement. Paul's expression implies that departed and glorified saints are interested observers of the trials and victories of the Christian on earth. Jesus in his teaching gave assurance of the preservation of identity; and if the angels in heaven rejoice over the redemption of one sinner, should we not be justified in concluding that our loved ones, who are now "as the angels," are at least equally interested in us here, and would not be denied the privilege of testifying their joy at our progress toward the heavenly Fatherland?

A. C. M., Boulder, Colo. In recent years the Gospel of healing has received renewed attention in some of the evangelical churches. Leading theologians, while holding that "the prayer of faith can save the sick," and that the Divine power is unchanged, are nevertheless indisposed to discuss seriously many of the claims made by certain preachers and healers. Their view is that man should use the best available means at hand and ask God to bless the effort. We have never heard of the Denver case mentioned in your letter.

O. R. S., Valley Cottage, N. Y. The question is purely controversial and can not be solved by discussion. Each of the parties has a right to choose according to his own conscience, and violates no law in so doing.

F., Montrose, Colo. 1. The passage in II Cor. 1:5 is not very clearly expressed in the translation, which seems to make Paul's logic rather confusing. It must be read in connection with both the verse that precedes and that which follows. Commentators hold that the meaning is that, as Jesus shared in the afflictions of humanity, He was therefore qualified to be man's Comforter in all his distresses. Again, in proportion as we suffer with Christ, or for His sake, or for the Gospel He gave to the world, so is the consolation we receive from Him through His sacrifice and His love for us. He calls His people's sufferings His own sufferings. Thus, as Paul shows, (v. 6) whether we be distressed or comforted, we are gainers since both work for our consolation and salvation. 2. A furlong was a Greek measure of distance equal to about 606 feet 9 inches. In your other questions you fail to state whether I or II Cor. is meant.

H. B., Follett, Tex., writes: "In our Bible Class in the M. E. Church here, in discussing the lesson for last week, the question was asked: 'What is the reason for a dearth of ministers to fill the pulpits of our country?' One member of the class said one reason was the lack of remuneration; another that it was caused by lack of religious family training. One man suggested that even the ministers' families were not turning out many ministers these days, and added that it had been the history of the ministerial supply all along in the past, that the minister's family had never supplied ministers of the Gospel, as should have been done."

It is true that the proportion of graduates in our colleges who embrace the ministerial profession has been growing smaller and smaller in recent years. This is due to two causes: First, to the unsound theology taught in many colleges at the present time, and for nearly ten years past. Many a student who enters the classes with the purpose of being trained for pastoral or missionary work, finds his faith gradually undermined by teaching which leaves him in the wilderness of doubt at the close, and wholly unfitted to proclaim the Gospel. The second cause is that in these days when the high cost of living affects all classes and professions, graduates find the material problems of life so pressing that the average income of a young minister is quite insufficient, and the outlook such that if he should choose the pulpit as his vocation, he is sure to have an uphill struggle, with marriage practically out of the question. We think your friend was wrong in asserting that ministers' families nowadays turn out few candidates for the ministry and missions. We know a good many such families and the supply of capable and earnest men and women which they have been giving to the Lord's work is not diminished in any appreciable degree. Theirs is the faith that trusts in God implicitly to open the way and furnish the means. And even in the prevailing "hard times," they see nothing to daunt them and no sacrifices to be made such as were endured by their parents and grandparents in the past. They have been carefully guarded from false theology and they are strong and equal to any struggle. With God leading, they can overcome all obstacles. Further, your friend has not looked very deeply into the matter of ministerial families, else he would have found that there is a very large number of them who have produced worthy and even distinguished workers in the Gospel at home and abroad. In such families, the torch of Truth is passed down from parents to children, and the results have been almost beyond computation.

E. W. M., East Lebanon, Me., writes: "This is the day of triumph for the wicked. Over $1,000,000 is involved in one of the lowest and most degrading exhibits of the so-called manly art. If there is anything that indicates the fallen condition of humanity, it is such an exhibition of the fighting instincts and the triumph of degrading tendencies over all the power and influence of better people. This kind of business has been fighting its way up for many years, against the better aims, desires and efforts of those who try to do the works of salvation. In such a place as New York, where everything is concentrated, the restraining power of good over evil ought to be mighty. Jersey City is a short way from New York. At such a time as this, so soon after the world war, it is not meet to have such business carried to the enormous financial success indicated. Why has there been no effective protest? Where has the power of Christendom been in hiding, that no one has stood with the congressman who tried to protest against such a sinful use of money, while the returned soldiers needed so much?"

E. W. M. is one of many readers who have written us letters in strong condemnation of the prize-fight. While we agree with their view in the main, we see no other way out of present conditions than by a more energetic proclamation of the Gospel, which is needed before we can hope to have better laws for the protection of public morals from the degradation that comes of such spectacles.

Mrs. L. C., Tioga, N. D. In the passage in Luke 24:25, Jesus was emphasizing the reverence due to Old Testament Scripture, and enlightening His hearers as to the prophecies concerning Himself. They had not studied them understandingly and had been slow to accept or apply them. His language was that of kindly reproach, rather than severe condemnation.

J. S., Drums, Pa., says: "I read in the Christian Herald of May 28 in the Editorial Forum about the Christian Herald and the Movies, which interested me very much. Now, I would like to see another editorial to tally with that: The Christian Herald and Sunday Base Ball. It is all the rage around here. They are desecrating the Sabbath by wholesale, every Sunday afternoon. Thousands congregate to witness the games. Where are our Christian lawmakers? Why are not laws passed to prohibit this Sunday nuisance? Why do the press and the pulpit allow it? Why not quit working at twelve o'clock on Saturday, and take the afternoon for ball-playing?"

There are many localities in which Sunday baseball is prohibited by local ordinance. It does not need a state or national law to effect a reform, if a county, borough, or township is resolved to have Sunday observed. It lies within the power of the people themselves to accomplish it.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is published weekly by the Christian Herald, at the Bible House, Fourth Avenue, 8th and 9th Sts., New York City. The Officers are: Graham C. Patterson, President and Treasurer; Geo. H. Sandison, Vice President; Rae D. Henkle, Secretary.

The Easiest and Surest Way to Make Jams, Jellies and Preserves

You can now be sure of perfect results

By MRS. A. LOUISE ANDREA

Mrs. Andrea was awarded the gold medal as lecturer on food and culinary topics at the Panama-Pacific International Exposition, San Francisco, in 1915; appointed official lecturer upon food and canning for the New York International Exposition in 1918.

THE system craves sweets and fruit juices. You absolutely need these important foods to keep you in good health. The best sweets are those you put up in your home—canned fruits, jams, jellies and marmalades. They give the ideal combination of purity, food value, economy and convenience.

One of the most important things in your preserving and canning is Karo Crystal White (Red Label), as it blends and harmonizes delightfully with all fruits. Karo helps bring out the delicate, natural flavor, and produces a clearer jelly without danger of sugar crystals forming later. Jams and marmalades will be of fine, smooth texture. And they will not have a cloying sweetness when prepared with part Karo.

To make the perfect syrup

Perfect results in home preserving are no longer a matter of "luck." Most preserving difficulties have come from using too much sugar.

Here is a method by which you can always have the finest, most delicious jams, clear jellies and rich preserves:

To make your syrup, which will keep perfectly without crystallizing, use 3 pints of Karo, Crystal White (Red Label) and 3 pints of granulated sugar to 2 quarts of water, and boil until sugar is completely dissolved. Skim if necessary; pour into hot jar, and use when canning fruits.

Karo (Red Label) is a fine, crystal-white syrup, with a natural affinity for the fruit juices.

It blends the fruit with the sugar, doing away with one of the great difficulties of putting up fruit at home. Karo Crystal White (Red Label) aids in emphasizing the natural flavor of the fruit.

You can depend upon it that fruit put up by this method will never grow tough or "candy" in the glass.

When ready to can the fruit have hot sterilized jars packed full of cleaned and prepared fruits, then fill jars to over-flowing with boiling hot syrup, adjust rubbers and covers to "partially seal", and sterilize under boiling water in wash boiler outfit according to time table given.

"Stretching" Fruits

Some fruits are so neutral in flavor that they may be used to advantage with other fruits, without detracting from either flavor or color. For example, apple juice will "stretch" the more expensive fruit juices for jellies. Its solid portion may act as a filler for other fruit jams. Again, rhubarb will help produce nearly twice as much strawberry marmalade, without lessening its delicate strawberry flavor or color. Thus you may use both rhubarb and apple in various combinations, so your more expensive fruits will go much further.

Valuable hints for making Jelly, Jam and Marmalade

All these products should be boiled rapidly to retain the best color. Large fruits used in marmalades should be thinly sliced. For jams, press berries through a sieve sufficiently fine to retain all seeds. Jams and marmalades should be made from both ripe and slightly under-ripe fruits, equal quantities of each, so that the finished product will have a jelly-like appearance.

All marmalades and jams should be allowed to cool before being placed in jars or glasses. This keeps the larger pieces in suspension, thereby giving a higher grade finished product.

VERY IMPORTANT Be sure to ask your grocer for Karo (Red Label)—the original preserving syrup. Do not accept substitutes.

All marmalades and jams should be allowed to cool before placing in jars or glasses. Fill glasses full. When cold, pour a thin layer of paraffin over the top.

Delving into Babylonian Ruins

New American School of Archeology Will Help to Increase Our Knowledge of the Bible by Uncovering Ancient Records

By EDGAR J. BANKS

THE first American to head an exploring expedition to Babylon was the late William Hayes Ward, formerly the editor of the Independent. Dr. Ward did no excavating work in the mounds of the buried Babylonian cities, but he explored among them and paved the way for the expedition to Nippur from the University of Pennsylvania, of which Dr. John P. Peters was the first head. The only other American expedition to Babylon went from the University of Chicago to Bismya; the present writer was the field director.

The expeditions to Nippur and Bismya were rich in results, but it now seems that the Ward expedition may be of the greatest permanent value. When Dr. Ward died in 1916 it was found that he had made a bequest providing for an archeological school in Mesopotamia, should the school be established within ten years of his death. His wish is about to be realized.

During the early months of 1920 Professor Albert T. Clay, the foremost of American Assyriologists, and one of the committee appointed to organize the archeological school in Mesopotamia, visited the ruins of Babylon and Assyria, and arranged with the British Government and with the local authorities for the establishment of the school. Funds are now being solicited to add to the bequest of Dr. Ward. We may expect that soon American students will be studying in the old city of Bagdad, exploring among the unknown ruins, and recovering from them the ancient records which will give us a better knowledge of the Bible and Bible times.

THE average Bible student does not fully realize the immense importance of Babylonian excavation work. Recently I met a preacher who was a graduate of a college and theological seminary who had never seen or even heard of the cuneiform writing of the Babylonians. The Assyriologist is essentially a Bible student, and he is doing more than all others to give the world the true meaning of the Bible and a real picture of Bible times. The scenes of the greater part of Bible history were laid in Mesopotamia. It was of that land that the Genesis stories relate. There was the early home of the Hebrews. It was in the South Babylonian city of Ur of the Chaldees where Abram received the call to migrate to Canaan. At Haran, a city of North Mesopotamia, he and the colony with him lived for many years. When the Hebrews came to Canaan it was to Mesopotamia that the patriarchs sent their sons to find wives.

The early Hebrew literature, the early written language, the religious forms and customs and the mode of living were taken from Mesopotamia. After the Hebrew kingdom was established there was always intercourse with the mother country. Sometimes there was peace; more frequently there was war. It was Sargon, King of Assyria, who transported the people of North Israel to Mesopotamia and settled them in the Babylonian cities. It was Nebuchadnezzar, the great king of Babylon, who captured Jerusalem, and later destroyed the city, and carried the Jews into exile in Babylonia. Again for several generations the Hebrews lived in the Babylonian mother country. When they returned to Canaan they took back with them much of the late Babylonian culture.

So great was the Babylonian influence on the Hebrews that traces of the Babylonian temple worship may be seen in the ritual of the Jewish synagogue and even of the Christian Church to this day. The priesthood, the altar, the perpetually burning light, the responsive readings, the chants, all were borrowed from the Babylonian temple service. Therefore for the right understanding of the history of the Church, the Jewish synagogue, the Hebrew temple, and, above all, of the Bible itself, the work which the American School in Mesopotamia hopes to accomplish, is of extreme importance.

IT IS frequently asked if the work of excavation among the ruins of the buried cities of Assyria and Babylonia is not about completed. Already two expeditions have gone from America, two from France, three from Germany and several from England. Several cities have been partially excavated—Nineveh, Khorsabad, Nimrud and Assur in Assyria; Babylon, Nippur, Bismya, Tello, Sippar and others in Babylonia.

Are there still other mounds to be excavated? Stand on the summit of any mound in Central Babylonia, and look in any direction over the level plain, and you may count the ancient ruins by the score. They are so many that they are not marked on any map. There are literally thousands of them still unexplored. Many of them bear no names even among the Arabs who rove about them. Some of the mounds are so low that they are scarcely perceptible above the level of the plain, and yet the lowest of them may conceal treasures from the time of Abraham. Other mounds rise to the height of more than one hundred and fifty feet, and look like mountains rising from the plain. Centuries will pass and scores and scores of expeditions will be sent there before one-half of the buried treasures in the Mesopotamian mounds are recovered.

But is it certain that all of these mounds contain buried treasures? The answer to that question is an emphatic "Yes." Dig wherever you will in any Assyrian or Babylonian mound and you will find objects of interest and frequently of inestimable value. There are the walls of the houses and palaces and temples, the statues of the gods and kings, the innumerable votive vases and cones. There are bricks, many of which are inscribed. There are the graves with the treasures of silver and gold and copper buried with the dead. There are the sculptured slabs from the palace walls. In the ruins of the private houses are the household utensils, the farmers' implements, and even the toys of the children.

More numerous than all else are the clay tablets inscribed with the wedge-shaped writing of Babylonia. Perhaps writing was not then so common among the masses of the people as it is now in America, but the public and business and temple scribes were numerous, and the material on which they wrote was practically indestructible. The little inscribed clay tablets abound in practically all of the ruins.

AN EXPERIENCE of my own illustrates the great numbers which exist where they are the least expected. While standing on the summit of the Bismya mounds, which I was excavating for the University of Chicago, my attention was frequently attracted to a mound about three hours, or ten miles, away to the northwest. By the refraction of the air the mound seemed much larger than it was, almost like a mountain. One day I took some workmen and visited it. It was called Drehem by the Arabs of the vicinity. The nearer we came to the mound the smaller it grew. When we reached it we found that it covered scarcely more than an acre, and that it was about forty feet in height. At the base of the mound we found a well laid up with bricks which were peculiar to the time just before Abraham. The ground was strewn with pottery fragments. Near by was the dry bed of an ancient canal. A couple of hours spent studying the place convinced me that the mound was nothing but the ruin of a watch tower from whose summit the ancient guards protected the traffic along the canal. It seemed to me that time spent in the excavation of this old fallen watch tower would be wasted.

Some years later I was in Bagdad at dinner with a native friend. The friend took me to a chamber which was crowded with reed baskets filled with small clay tablets. Never before, even in the great European museums, had I seen such hosts of tablets.

"They just came from Drehem, a little mound near Bismya," I was told.

It seemed incredible. Some of my own workmen had gone to Drehem to dig out the ancient bricks which were projecting from the surface. There were bricks in abundance, and when the outer wall was dug away, there were inscribed clay tablets in such quantities that it was difficult to guess their number. It is estimated that there were about 400,000 of them. Many of them were taken to the Louvre and the British Museum, and to Yale. Nearly 20,000 of them have passed through my hands and are now scattered among hundreds of museums and libraries and schools in America to serve as object lessons of the life and times of Abraham. Several thousands of them are still with me to remind me of the discovery I did not make, and of a ruin which I believed could yield nothing of value. A similar discovery was made at Jokha and at Tello farther south, and at Abu Habba in the north, and scores of similar discoveries will yet be made.

HOW did it happen that inscribed tablets and other objects were buried in such numbers in the ruins? To answer that question one must study the country, the architecture and the building materials of Mesopotamia.

In old Babylonia there were few trees other than the date palm, the wood of which was almost worthless for building purposes. The country is a level alluvial plain, entirely without stones excepting along the edge of the Arabian plateau to the west.

But Babylonia abounds with clay of an exceedingly fine texture. Dig wherever you will and you will find an abundance of it. This is why the Babylonians made not only their houses of clay bricks, but they shaped the clay into drain-pipes, water-pipes, pots, sling-balls, statues, game-boards, dolls, toy animals, babies' rattles, household gods, clay coffins, bread ovens, beads, and into tablets on which they wrote their letters and kept their records. The houses were always of bricks, seldom burned, but generally sundried. The private house was a single story high, and across the top of its walls were laid the trunks of date trees to form the roof. Upon the date trunks was a thick layer of clay to stop up the cracks, or sometimes the clay was heaped up like a low dome that the rain water might flow from the roof.

The people who lived in these clay houses threw their discarded letters and business records into a pile in the corner of the room, for they could not burn them. The more treasured records were buried in pots beneath the clay floor.

In the large merchantile houses and temples the records were piled up in heaps. Frequently war or pestilence or famine or drought compelled the people to migrate. Then they abandoned their clay houses. The piles of clay letters and business documents, with the other unnecessary objects, were left behind. Soon the date palm trunks of the roof decayed and broke. The clay of the roof then fell into the chamber and buried whatever had been left there. During the rains of winter the walls melted and flowed down, and the ruins of the house became a low mound of clay.

At a later time other people came and built their home on its ruins. The new house in its turn was abandoned, and it fell to make place for a third one. It was in this way that the Babylonian cities and the treasures in them were buried in their own ruins. They were not destroyed by earthquakes, or covered by drifting sands. The mounds are made up almost entirely of decomposed sundried bricks.

In some of the mounds which are but a few feet high most ancient objects are found on the surface; that is because the place was abandoned in very early times and has not been occupied since then. Other mounds rise to the height of more than a hundred feet. That is because the place has been occupied by many different houses, and the ruins of each house have added to its height as generation succeeded generation.

A SHAFT dug from the summit of the tallest mound down to its bottom reveals traces of the various peoples who have lived there. At the top near the surface you will find the pottery fragments and the glass beads of the modern Arabs. Beneath them are the coins of the more civilized Arabs of the time of the Arabian Nights. Still lower are the Hebrew bowls and other objects from the exiles who preferred to remain in Babylonia; then the coins of the Parthians, next the Persian, then the tablets and inscribed bricks of Nebuchadnezzar's time, then layer after layer from the various Babylonian dynasties back to the time of Abraham. Still lower are the records of the Sumerians, and then down at the bottom are the pottery fragments and stone implements of some prehistoric people whose names have been forgotten, and whose age can not be fixed.

Under the old Turkish rule it was next to impossible to obtain permission to excavate in Babylonia. It was the hardest thing that the excavator had to do. But now the British control Mesopotamia and the excavator will be welcomed as he has long been in Egypt. Though something like a million inscribed objects have been discovered in Mesopotamia, it may truly be said that the real work there is just about to begin, and what has been discovered is but little in comparison with what will be.

Of what practical value are the excavations in these buried cities, or why should we seek to find the records of the long-forgotten past? The question may be answered by any of several others. Of what value is the study of any ancient history? What is the use of studying astronomy or any other science? Of what value is any knowledge? Why study the Bible, or seek information to help understand it?

Once when I was about to give a series of lectures at a Southern assembly, Dr. George Stewart, the noted Birmingham preacher, in announcing the lectures to his audience of young people, said: "If you are not interested in the archeology of the Bible, don't tell any one, for it would be a sad reflection on the gray matter which is supposed to be in your heads."

Indian Folk Lore: The Wise Vizier

By EDNA A. COLLAMORE

AN EMPEROR, at practise with his sword,
Wounded himself with careless thrust or turn.
The courtiers, who feasted at his board,
Professed their great regret and deep concern.
The vizier only grieved not with the rest,
"Your majesty, all happens for the best."

The Emperor, enraged by this remark,
A-hunting next day with the vizier went.
In a dry well, deep in the forest dark,
He thrust the vizier that he might repent.
"Remember, Vizier," was his cruel jest,
"All things that happen, happen for the best."

But as the Emperor rode on alone,
Two mighty warriors before him stood.
They led him, prisoner, to the altar stone
Of an old temple in the ancient wood.
"Prepare to die upon the new moon's rise.
Kali demands a human sacrifice."

THE Emperor stood speechless, pale with fright,
While priests about his neck the garland bound;
But as the High Priest would perform his rite
His keen eyes rested on the recent wound.
"Will Mother Kali look on blemished dead!
Away—and find another in his stead."

Back through the forest rode the Emperor then,
And from the deep, dank well the vizier drew,
And begged his pardon, once and once again,
"Oh, Vizier, you were wiser than I knew.
But for the wound, I now were Kali's guest,
And all that happens, happens for the best."

"Your majesty," the smiling vizier said,
"I own you as the savior of my life,
For I, unblemished, would be lying dead,
Slain by the shining sacrificial knife,
Had not I found, within this well, safe rest.
All things that happen, happen for the best."

An Old-Fashioned Woman in Congress

THAT the new day of woman is at hand is emphasized in the matter-of-fact way in which Miss Alice Robertson, Oklahoma's Congresswoman, has been received in Washington.

Thinking directly to the heart of her problems and free from all fads, it is not surprising to find people saying that Miss Robertson, an anti-suffragist, has done more for the cause of woman in politics than all of the advocates of militancy put together. She is daily proving that women in politics are not necessarily emotional and impractically visionary.

All her life Miss Robertson has been accustomed to doing things and getting things. She comes from a line of sturdy pioneer missionary stock, fearless and with proper control of the emotions.

Small wonder then that the cause upon which she had set her heart and to which she had devoted so much of her energies—the welfare of the Indian—should be the thing she was best qualified to do in Congress and that she should be placed upon the Committee of Indian Affairs.

Miss Robertson believes in the power of prayer in politics and that "right will prevail."

"My election came in direct answer to prayer," she asserts, "and, God helping me and giving me strength, I will try to make good."

"My platform contained and announced my politics and creed. It read: 'I am a Christian. I am an American. I am a Republican.'" And on these simple declarations of faith, she believes, "hang all the law and the prophets."

"WOMAN'S only excuse for being in politics," she says, "is to work for a better and cleaner government, to tell the truth, to do justice to all and to refrain from bitterness, following the Great Exemplar who, 'when He was reviled, reviled not again.'"

"My advice to women is to learn politics. You have got to learn your new responsibility of citizenship. Go to your precinct and your ward meetings; learn what is going on there, for if you do not interest yourselves in what is going on there, you have no right to complain of what your government is or is not doing."

"Your precinct is the place to begin reforms rather than in the halls of Congress. I don't believe that much for the home can be done by national legislation. I made up my mind before I came to Washington that I was going to sit back for awhile and listen and see how things are run here before I resorted to political speeches—and vote on the side of right when the time came. I hope to be fearless to do the right always. When God didn't give me big things to do, I tried to do the little ones well."

"I started out in Oklahoma to interest women in Government activities even while I opposed suffrage. I founded a string of Woman Must Know societies for studying government, and I am still of the opinion that if women spent in studying government the time they spend in playing bridge they could clean up the old parties when they get into them. The greatest need of America today is an awakened personal conscience, and no government can rise beyond its source in the ward or the precinct."

"While I will not undertake to say that it is wrong for a woman to play bridge, I will say that it is the very height of injustice for the courts to fine boys for 'shooting craps' in the alleys and at the same time to ignore drawing-room gambling, for gambling is as bad in one form as in another. It is indeed the public conscience that must be aroused and now that we have suffrage we shall be worse or better for it, just as we are willing or unwilling to be guided by the pure instincts that God puts in a woman and are not controlled by selfishness and over emotionalism."

"I don't know whether I am going to like my new job or not, but I was always a plucky coward. I did things because I was afraid not to, and I shall try to do what I can to bring about simple living and honesty in law-making. As I have neither a political past nor political ambitions, I may be able to get away with the job."

"When the men in my district urged me to run for Congress on the ground that I was the only one who could beat the Democratic candidate, I fought the problem out with myself on my knees. That is precisely the way I am doing with problems in Congress, and I don't think I am the only one who settles public questions on his or her knees. There is more of that in America today than most people admit."

ONE cannot spend an hour with Miss Robertson without being impressed with her idealistic character, but with it, there is a practical common sense and judgment that augur well for her new career. She frankly credits her success to recognition of the culmination of the work of twenty-five ancestors among the Indians in the past ninety-five years.

Miss Robertson is unlike the traditional politician in appearance and describes herself as a "plain, old-fashioned woman who has always done a man's work."

Her hair is silvered with the passing of her sixty-seven years, but you would never think of her as anything but middle-aged, with a keen sense of humor and the enthusiasm of youth itself. Her voice is low and said. "I just had to tell you how fine I thought your talk was. Your views on Indian education are mine also."

It was Theodore Roosevelt, then United States Civil Service Commissioner, and twelve years later he named Miss Robertson as Postmistress of Muskogee, a position she held, for more than eight years. She was the first woman in the United States to be put in charge of a first-class post office and was the highest salaried woman in the Government service at the time.

"Back in the old days," said Miss Robertson, "when things were not going as nicely as now, President Roosevelt helped me greatly. My mother was an invalid and I had to be with her much of the time. He made me postmistress of Muskogee, so I could attend to mother and keep the postoffice too. It was one of the best jobs in Indian Territory, and others wanted it, but he told me I should hold it as long as he was President, and he kept his word."

While her presentation of the Indian problems first attracted Colonel Roosevelt's admiration, her efficient service in helping to fit out and recruit the Rough Rider regiment in the conflict with Spain increased his esteem. He once paid this tribute to her: "Wherever Alice Robertson is, whatever her surroundings, she is one of the great women of America."

Miss Robertson's patriotic services during the World War quite equalled those during the Spanish-

American war. When mobilization began, trainload after trainload of soldiers passed through Muskogee on their way to the many training-camps in Texas. She did not wait for Red Cross funds or assistance, but loaded her automobile with sandwiches made from her own home-baked ham and met every troop train. She would not permit a man in uniform to pay for a meal in her restaurant, and more than 5,000 of them accepted her hospitality.

PERHAPS the story of her future may be found in her past. To begin with she is a Daughter of the American Revolution, entitled to wear a barred badge denoting five fighting ancestors. Miss Robertson was born in 1854 at the old Tullahassee Mission, within ten miles of Muskogee. She is the granddaughter of the Rev. Mr. Worcester, who was a pioneer missionary to the Indians in Georgia before they were driven to the Indian Territory. Her grandfather's efforts to enlighten the Indians stirred powerful enmities against him, and he was sentenced to a four-year term in the Georgia penitentiary, scornful an offer of pardon if he would abandon his efforts for the Indians. After serving one year and a half of his term, he was freed by a decision of the United States Supreme Court and soon thereafter moved his family to the new home of the Cherokees in Indian Territory. He set up a printing press at Park Hill, where he published a paper for the Indians and printed religious books in their tongue. Here his daughter married Rev. William S. Robertson, also a missionary, who devoted his entire life to missionary work for the Creek tribes.

Miss Robertson's mother was well-educated and ambitious, and translated the Bible into the language of the Cherokees and Creeks while Alice was a child. The girl grew up in an atmosphere of service to humanity and was sent to Elmira College, New York, where she was graduated with a Master's degree. After this she worked for a time as a clerk in the Indian Bureau at Washington and then returned to her home to take up the work of her ancestors by founding the Henry Kendall College at Tulsa, an outgrowth of her Boarding School for Girls. In the early eighties, she raised funds among her eastern friends to build Nuyaka Mission in the Creek Nation and supervised its erection, and was for years Government Supervisor of the Creek Indian Schools. In 1885 she was called to Muskogee by the Mission Board to take charge of a boarding school for girls of the Five Indian Tribes and raised funds for the buildings and for scholarships for girls without money. These girls were taught the arts of cooking, sewing and general housework in addition to their other studies so that as wives and homemakers or as teachers they now exert their influence through the farms of the Five Tribes.

Then the scope of the school was widened to include the Indian boys who wanted an education in a Christian school, and in the fall of 1894 the Presbyterian School for Girls was raised to college standard under the name of the Henry Kendall College and opened well modulated, and so clearly does she enunciate that she has no difficulty in making her sound ideas heard. Her eyes are blue and she looks at you with a reserve until satisfied that you are in earnest, then all of the straightforwardness of her goes into her conversation. She is modestly gowned in black or blue and has the manner of one who dresses carefully and straightway forgets her clothes.

Her simple unostentatious religious fervor has already influenced politics in her own state, for men always bow reverently before a religion that is practiced in perfect faith, and around the national Capitol there is real veneration and admiration for her. The members of Congress know her big heart and brain and hold her as a sister or mother in their regard.

IN POLITICAL heredity she is a typical Roosevelt product. Many years ago she came East to the Lake Mohonk conferences to speak about the needs of the Oklahoma Indians. She was conscious at first of only a blur of faces, but finally a face separated itself from the others and Miss Robertson found herself addressing that one understanding face. Her address finished, the attentive listener made his way to her side.

A Romance of Missionary Service

By LESLIE GORDON BARNARD

Illustrated by William C. McNulty

IT SEEMED to Claire Grantham that her heart stopped beating for a matter of seconds when Stephen's familiar triple ring sounded at the door that night. She had known he would come—known and feared it.

His name "Dr. Stephen Patterson" had stared at her all week from the notice board outside the church, advertising the farewell missionary service to be held in his honor. He had arrived here in his home town only at noon from missionary headquarters in the city. He came to tea, just as he always used to of old, but now it seemed less grudgingly welcomed by the family, as though the thing they had feared had passed away.

It was after the meal that the past obtruded, when he asked her to attend the service, and she refused.

He took it in silence, to say at last: "You really won't come then, Claire?"

Was it the appeal of his voice, or that dumb misery in his eyes that touched her? It was a momentary impulse though. She told herself, half angrily, that it was not fair of him to expect her to attend this service which represented the thing that had come between.

"No, Stephen. I'm sorry."

"I'm sorry too, Claire," he said gravely. "It's our last Sunday night together, Claire. I was hoping, maybe—"

He turned, squared his shoulders with seeming effort, and she saw him pass through the door. That peculiar athletic springiness had gone from his step, as though the mental burden had reared leadenly upon his physical being. It reminded her, this silent retreat of his, of that time she had let him go from her on another Sunday evening, two long years ago, when he had asked, with a sudden fierce impulsiveness, the question she had hesitated to face, and when he was half way down the steps she had thrown aside all hesitation and called to him in a little low cry wrung from her heart, and he had come slowly back, with the light of hope dawning in his eyes.

How much better, she told herself now, how much better if she had let him go that time.

THE sound of the closing of the front door was followed by his familiar footsteps on the gravel walk, to be merged at last with those of the crowds from all parts of the town heading churchward for the evening service. He had delayed his going until the last moment, hopefully.

Claire tried to interest herself in a book, and failing, rose impatiently. On an eschiroire near at hand her eye caught sight of a familiar letterhead—Stephen had inadvertently left it there. She knew in that moment that the sacred symbol which was worked into the lithographed design had become almost—hateful to her. A cross; a cross of sacrifice! Underneath was a scroll-like motto; it stared up, challengingly, at her. She read the letter again. It ended:

"Your passage has been arranged by S-S Cormorant sailing from New York on the 20th direct for South African ports. Please report to this office, in readiness to leave for New York, on the 18th at the latest."

Two days only now; then Stephen would go, and she would be left behind. Better—far better that she should have sent him away that night two years ago; better and easier for them both. Had she not known then that this was his life purpose—that his medical course was preparatory to the mission field? And she had thought her influence, her persuasion, her love would surely hold him back.

That motto worried her: "If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me."

That might be all right for others—but not for Stephen—for Stephen who had such rosy prospects if he stayed at home—home comforts; social position; and the lucrative practice that would come to one of his ability.

He had no right to go.

The voice of the bells calling worshippers to the evening service ceased. Somewhere in the house a clock struck the hour of seven. Over in the church he and she had attended for years they would be holding a farewell service for Stephen—her Stephen. And she was not there.

"It's our last Sunday together, Claire—" that was what he had said.

SHE went to the window and threw open the shutter. Shades of evening were bringing coolness. Touched by the sunset the church steeple was tipped with gold, and every window a thing of burnished copper. Just ten minutes' walk. She could still make it. The vision of foliage and buildings and the church was dimmed; some hidden spring had been touched. She almost ran to put on her hat.

It took longer to get ready and to the church than she had thought, her fingers refusing to act nimbly, as though all suppleness had departed. Stephen was speaking when she got there; his voice, rich, melodious, quiet, with none of the tricks of the orator, yet held a simple eloquence that thrilled his auditors. Claire slipped unnoticed into a seat where a pillar shaded her.

"The Path of the Cross"—that was his subject. He did not speak of his own sacrificial spirit, but represented earnestly, compellingly, the challenge of a spiritually hungry world—pressing upon his hearers the challenge of the Cross.

Afterwards they sang. It seemed to Claire she had never heard such singing there before; for, after all, the power of mere volume is subordinate to that of heart power.

She did not sing; her eyes were on Stephen up there on the platform beside the benevolent figure of old Doctor Grayson, the minister. Stephen did not sing either; it seemed to the girl that into the fervor of spiritual exaltation had come that dumb misery that had smitten her before; that even now Stephen was enduring the cross. She stepped, unthinkingly, from the shadow of the pillar the better to see him, some urge of sympathy upon her; his eyes met hers. He went white, and then it seemed that his lips were unstopped. She knew he was singing to her. It was the last verse they were singing then, the words of which could never again be banished from her memory.

"God be with you till we meet again,
Keep love's banner floating o'er you,
Smite death's threatening wave before you:
God be with you till we meet again."

TILL they met again! Where—when? She knew now she had not faced that question fully; that some hope had still been in her heart that her stubborn resistance would save him for her—save him for himself, his career at home. She had never accepted a ring nor allowed a definite engagement to be announced, some fear holding her. Her mind ran to that time when she had felt at last her own impotence, and in anger that none the less held determination, she had told him:

"If you will go, you'll go alone. You must choose between me—and this!"

He had chosen. Friendship remained; indeed his love for her had not failed—of that she was inwardly sure. And yet there was this barrier of her own raising, and now, as she watched the people crowding around him, and his brave smiles of farewell, she felt how far apart from him she had been. Had been, because now the memory of that last verse as he sang it facing her made her heart a-throb with the same wild, genuine passion of emotion she had felt that time when she had recalled him to the steps two years ago.

"My dear, what a wonderful man he is!" It seemed that on every hand folk were saying that to each other. She had not thought of Stephen as a hero so much as a fanatic in this affair.

Stephen—quiet, steady-going Stephen—a hero! She knew tonight that he was. No flaunting of banners, no martial music, just the simple farewell of those who had known him and loved him and now rejoiced, even while they sorrowed at their own loss, that the crown of his manhood was to be the crown of sacrifice.

HE SEEMED to know she would be waiting for him. After the last farewells of the people were over, he found her just outside the church porch, standing in the shadow of an ancient elm. He slipped an arm into hers and they walked the familiar homeward way as they had done so many times. It was as though the estrangement had never come.

They did not talk. It was a moment rather for silence; a time when the shadow of decision—or parting—lay over them. And so at last to the creeper-covered porch, whose white colonial pillars seemed like familiar friends, speaking of the old days.

"Claire!"

"Yes, Stephen."

Her voice trembled; some passionate thing was urging her towards what her reason still tried to term indiscretion. If he should ask again, what should she say? All her life had been lived in familiar surroundings, without lack of any creature comfort, with indulgent parents upon whom one might lean. She trembled lest he should speak; and again lest he shouldn't speak.

"Claire!" came a call.

Not Stephen's voice this time; her mother's, with Mrs. Grantham herself framed in a suddenly lighted doorway.

"Yes, mother?"

"It's too cool to stay out there."

"We'll be in in just a minute, mother."

"I want you to come in now."

Decision shaped itself on Mrs. Grantham's mouth. She made no offer to go until she had their company. Tradition and habit held; Claire capitulated, Stephen followed quietly behind.

MRS. GRANTHAM had played a safe game. The moment of crisis was past. Inside, the familiar room, with its people, and its conversation and its commonplaces, brought Claire back to a realization of the things she had nearly done. And yet Stephen was going—tonight. To hear the family speak of it he might have been taking a month's trip to Europe. Mrs. Grantham knew what she was about.

She had never believed in foreign missions—still less since Stephen's advent had threatened to take her daughter from her.

In the end, though, Stephen had his moment when they went to the gate together and watched the folk coming in four cars to escort Stephen to the station. But the dampening influence of the last hour had told. No question trembled on his lip.

"Some day perhaps things will change—Claire. If they do, if ever you should feel differently—I want you to know there'll never be anybody else for me—never!"

He misinterpreted her silence.

"I wouldn't want, though, Claire to spoil your life

If—if the right one should come, I want you to know, too, that you will always have my—friendship—and best wishes. Perhaps you'll write now and then?"

They were coming down the street now—the folk to take him away; only a moment—and the thing that struggled within her could find no expression.

"Good-bye, Claire."

She felt his hand grip hers, and knew he was gone, and yet she could not speak, or act, or see . . .

She found her way in past the old familiar pillars that seemed to stand in stiff reproach.

MORNING brought sane reflection; and reflection brought a thrill of hope.

"There will never be anyone else for me—never!" That was what he had said. She knew he meant it—or it would not have been Stephen.

"He'll be back again. Just a few years while I can have my fling of life here, and then if he wants me still to go, I'll know better where I stand. That's just what mother thinks, too. It's very romantic and all, his going, but it wouldn't make life out there any less monotonous and—terrible." She told this to her mirror, and the delightful reflection there smiled back. In the morning it is easy to be optimistic. The statement was rather a businesslike one for such an affair, but then in the morning, too, one may more easily be businesslike.

Claire tripped downstairs to breakfast, whistling. Mrs. Grantham hearing, smiled her approval, and nodded satisfaction to Mr. Grantham, who was much too busy with his bacon and eggs, and the financial page propped up before him, to notice.

Many things may be charged against Claire's disposition; against her mode of thinking at this time. Opposite these must be reckoned the influence of a home in which religion ceased to be taken seriously the moment its boundaries of comfort were overstepped; against these, too, a life of sheltered ease and luxury, and a philosophy both inherited and nurtured by conditions, that said, if not in so many words: "Don't do anything that isn't normal, and everything will come out very well in the end. Meanwhile be happy!"

Stephen was hers—though temporarily separated; there was a sense of security in this that was lulling. She came more and more to accept that as the hour went by. And the town, ringing with the praises of this native son, extolling his ability and his heroism threw about her a certain romance, a sense of reflected glory. Whenever she heard folks speaking of him, she wanted to say: "Yes, Stephen and I are to all intents engaged; we haven't decided just when—because he feels it his duty to try out life in Africa before he sends for me." That would have sounded very well. She adopted however, merely an attitude in keeping . . . And then his wire came.

"Not sailing by Cormorant as expected. Africa cancelled. Anxious discuss new plans with you. Arriving home Saturday morning."

MINGLED with the sudden warm emotion that swept her, was a singular, cold chill. Stephen not going after all! Stephen, of whom the town had made a hero, for whom the farewell had been held, coming back!

What would people say?

Claire felt that she should have rejoiced that he had done this for her; she saw through it well enough, knew that her pleading, her love, her influence had not been in vain. And yet, there was this keen sense of disappointment in him. In the escritoire still lay that letter, with its symbol of sacrifice, with its message of the Cross. It made her uncomfortable—and Claire disliked discomfort in any form.

What would people say? How should she walk down the street with him, and watch their faces, and penetrate, by intuition, their thoughts of him—and of her?

She could wire him not to come!

Besides there was a good excuse. Daphne Rodden's house-party was this week-end. She had promised to go. Daphne's house parties were always gay occasions. Claire felt the need of just such relaxation now. Daphne would motor over for her Saturday morning early, to take her to the great house just fringing the suburbs of the city.

Impulsively she wired him: "Don't come. Will write you beginning of week. Meanwhile advise new plans by mail."

She summoned Estelle, the maid.

"Estelle, you pass the telegraph office on the way to the 'Starland,' don't you? I wish you'd send this wire for me."

Estelle always went on Friday nights to the movies at the "Starland." She was dressed now awaiting her usual escort. She took the message and the money, and thrust them into her handbag. Barry Briggs, the postman, who formed her usual escort, spoke his long-awaited-for words that night in the cool dusk, on the way to the "Starland." For Estelle telegrams and responsibilities ceased to exist. The message lay snugly in her bag.

THE house-party was a huge success, if Saturday evening's dance was to be taken as any criterion. The infectious gaiety into which Claire plunged wholeheartedly, wilfully, took her mind off those things which troubled her. And Claire's nature was to postpone the evil day.

In the whirl of pleasure Claire was scarcely conscious of a fact patent to everyone else.

Someone remarked to Daphne Rodden: "Look at Claire, my dear, and Oris Holter. I should think her friend Stephen Patterson's going would have meant something more to her?"

Daphne's eyebrows raised.

"Friend?" she echoed.

"Well, she's not engaged to him anyway, is she?"

"If she's not," said Daphne, "she ought to be. They've been going together all these years. I can't get anything out of her—she won't talk about it at all. It's my own opinion Claire is coming to realize that she's not cut out for a missionary's wife. Fancy the interior of Africa—ugh! Heat, and niggers, and snakes and what not! Anyway Oris does seem to be making a hit."

Stephen, indeed, had never used such wiles as Oris now. Stephen was too direct, too ingenuous, too serious perhaps, for wiles. But Oris was fascinating.

Christianity in a Business Office

"SIMON PETER, servant" says the first verse of the first chapter of II Peter—"Simon Peter, servant of Jesus Christ," and that is the way I desire to have it stand concerning me—Joseph A. Richards, servant—servant of Jesus Christ, at the age of 62, and looking back on the infinite mercy of God displayed constantly through every one of those years.

Indeed I have been accustomed for some time to say to my seat-mate on the New York subway, no matter who he may be, when he lifts his eye a moment from his newspaper: "Pardon me, sir, but would you permit me to pass along a little bit of good news which we don't get in the newspaper." After he has looked me up and down and given me consent to say on, I say: "It is just this, sir: 'God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son that whosoever believeth on Him should not perish but have everlasting life.' I have believed that ever since I was eleven years old and it has made life for me and I like to pass it on."

Sometimes he is glad, sometimes he is almost mad and sometimes he is dumb with ignorance or with indifference. But I feel that in so doing I am a servant, a servant of Jesus Christ, for believing on Him has made life for me. Yes, I do like to pass it on. No, not that I like to break through the proper reserve which a man rightly feels in the presence of strangers, but there is a man who may be lost and Jesus Christ died for lost men—so I say it, and thus I like to, and many happy experiences I have had doing so.

But, here am I launched on a statement the like of which I never made before and which I hesitated to make at all until the other day I read with special illumination that verse in Matthew, "Let your light so shine before men that they may see your good works and glorify your Father which is in heaven." At the request of the editor and in obedience to Scripture I am letting this my light shine so that it may, yes it will—I never before realized that it was possible, for a man to hold up a light to glorify the face of Jesus Christ. But that is what the Word says, isn't it? "Glorify your Father which is in Heaven" and my Father which is in Heaven can be glorified by me only by my throwing light on the thorn-scarred, compassionate face of His Beloved Son.

ARE there any good works of mine that can cause a reader of this paper to see the love of God in that wondrous face? If so, remember that He Himself is the only worker of good works in any of us. "For it is God that worketh in you to will and to do of His good pleasure."

I have always believed in being an out-and-outer. "I know whom I have believed" and in my young manhood I was given lessons in adding to my faith, virtue, or manly courage. My father and

"CAN a successful business man be a successful Christian?" seems pretty conclusively answered in this remarkable self-analysis by Joseph A. Richards. mother and two or three of my pastors started me in the study of the Word, and the Bible is bread and milk and good strong meat, and I like it. tated to cast my line over my own desk at the business man who sat at the other side, and prayer in my office has been a great refreshment to me.

As a director in the National Bible Institute, years ago, I was glad to stand in Madison Square and proclaim the riches of God's grace to the crowds who would stop to listen. Oh, what a luxury that was (I cannot do it now, for I ruined my throat at it), but I will remember the test of courage that came to me when they wanted me to speak right opposite my own office door in the Tribune Building in City Hall Park. Pride said, "Your business associates will discount your good judgment" and Christ said, "Confess me before men" and Christ got the victory.

I generally have two Bible classes a week through most of the year and if my classes get half as much joy from the weekly exercise as I do, as a steward of the manifold grace of God, why, I am additionally rejoiced.

BUT the editor asked some definite questions that he thought a man of my age and business experience might be able to answer. One of the questions was, "Has religion any influence in the business office?"

Well, I am sure that our office has been a pleasanter place to do business because many of us have recognized the power of Christ in one another. The very lady who is taking these notes at this moment received the Lord Jesus as the result of a straight appeal in the office sometime ago and our fellowship has been blessed all the years since. Almost every one who has been associated with our business has had Christ presented to him as the Giver of life and the Saviour of the soul, and time and time again I have had men and women say to me that our office was a pleasant place in which to work.

The editor has asked: "Can a man make a success in business and still be a Christian?" I have never attributed to myself any great capability for the advertising business which has so happily absorbed a good deal of my attention, but of one thing I am very sure, that whereas I have daily asked God to help me in my tasks, I have found His help always present. We have had our ups and downs in this business, which my godly father founded in 1874, and we have made our share of mistakes, quite likely, but we have come through with the respect of our neighbors and the satisfaction of having always tried to do a good job, as though the Lord were looking on. Indeed, as the Word says, "As unto God and not unto man."

And now, as I said before, this is an entirely unusual statement and I pray that I may have been so letting my light shine, that those who read this testimony may glorify my Father which is in Heaven.

Helping Russia

EVERY reader of the Christian Herald will rejoice in the news that a way has been found to help stricken Russia. In her extremity she has appealed to the United States to save her from the appalling disaster that seems to be impending. Famine, cholera and fever are steadily increasing the number of their victims. To avert the "hunger death" before it reaches tidal-wave proportions, it will be imperative to act quickly. The American Relief Administration which has never failed to respond to the call of human suffering, is now preparing to enter on one of the greatest campaigns it ever has undertaken, and with Secretary Hoover in charge of the work we have the best guarantee that it will be managed skilfully, expeditiously, and—let us hope—with triumphant success.

Many years ago, while famine was raging in sixteen Russian provinces, the United States proffered help which was sorely needed by that afflicted country. The steamship Leo, chartered by the Christian Herald, loaded with flour to make bread for the starving population and with medical supplies and delicacies for the sick, landed at Riga. The cargo was wholly the gift of Christian Herald readers. It was distributed by committees and the result, as the official records show, was the saving of thousands of lives. The present famine, however, is a far greater problem, being as extensive, if not even more so, in its area and in the multitudes of sufferers, as that in China, which has just been relieved through America's splendid generosity.

China has always been our friend. Russia, too, though for the last three years she has been at war with organized government throughout the world. In her madness she has lost sight of the means of subsistence. Industry's wheels have ceased to revolve, and agriculture has been almost wholly neglected. Now, as an inevitable result, the forces of terrorism with which she had hoped to conquer have met a greater force with an invincible leader, General Hunger, whose armies, millions strong, are now sweeping resistlessly through the land. There is no power on earth that can check the frenzy of those starving hordes. Even the soldiers sent to halt them, softened by the spectacle of suffering, seemed to have made common cause with them and refused to add to their misery. And the famishing masses sweep onward, plundering towns and even devouring raw horseflesh, and stripping the country as bare of food as the locust swarms strip it of grass and leaf.

With abundant funds at his disposal and with wide experience in dealing with the relief of suffering, Mr. Hoover has an opportunity to add to his laurels by the Russian Relief Campaign. He will have the prayers and best wishes of our people for success, but the task is so huge that no other nation than America, the world's Almoner, is capable of undertaking a work, the very magnitude of which appalls. Yet we believe that it will be carried through successfully. And should the need arise, the Christian Herald, which has never failed to respond to the call to duty, will gladly give all the aid at its command.

Teaching Through Events

THAT God sometimes teaches men great truths through events themselves, rather than through the lens of the statesman or the publicist, is a fact which is seldom sufficiently emphasized. It is, therefore, all the more encouraging to find that this aspect of the case is being seriously considered, especially with reference to the lessons we may draw from the late war, and the conditions that now prevail throughout the world.

In a recent gathering in Williamstown, Mass., of international leaders in public thought and education, Chief Justice Taft spoke of the "good the war has done." It has changed the international mind and the psychology of the people, he declared, and has impressed all the world with the inevitable interdependence of people and countries, and the necessity for recognizing and acting upon it, if the world is to progress at all.

This is nothing more than the old, simple truth that the human race is one great family, and that to act according to the will of the beneficent Creator we must live at peace with each other, in relations of friendship and mutual good-will. This is the lesson taught by the Scriptures and by the prophets, who foreshadowed the coming day when such relationship would be fully realized.

If, then, we rightly grasp the lessons of the war, we must see that the first to be taught is that selfish, destructive ambition for world conquest fails, as it always fails, and those who cast their fortunes with it go down in the crash. As to our future status, if we read the next lesson aright, it must be the cultivation by every available means, of friendly relations with all nations. This is the path of brotherhood and good-will and it has been clearly indicated by events, rather than by any other modern political or sociological teaching.

President Lowell of Harvard, speaking in a similar vein, held that one of our national tasks is the enlightenment of other nations concerning the duty of moral responsibility, of honest, conscientious, even magnanimous treatment in their dealings with each other. No true American will ever regret our generous course in Cuba and in China; in the first, the surrender of Cuba to its people after we had established good conditions politically and physically; and in the second the return of the Boxer indemnity in China, thereby notifying the world in both instances that we had set our faces in opposition to power without responsibility. This sense of responsibility, national and international, should find emphasis in the coming Conference for Disarmament, as it is based upon the idea of peaceful, orderly conduct among nations, with a due regard to justice and consideration for each other's rights.

President Garfield of Williams College, who also took the forward-looking attitude in his address, pointed out still another outcome of the war which held a practical lesson. While in the past isolation had been necessary to our growth and development, he held that now we see a new conception of our relations to the world. Isolation is no longer possible or desirable. The great war made this clear, and we must share the burden of the new responsibility.

Unquestionably the new angle of vision of which these thinkers spoke will be communicated to countless other minds. It is not a scientific or philosophic discovery. It is simply a result of the great object lessons God is giving to the world through events, the significance of which lies within the comprehension of the average man or woman. Wars, discrownings, revolutions, pestilences stand out in contrast with noble deeds of helpfulness and sympathy. And the lessons cannot be fully learned, save by those who have qualified through struggle and suffering.

A Free Tie

A PRESS notice from Kansas, mentioning a certain town, says:

"The school patrons have grown tired of the great display that is being made of fashionable attire at school; a display so great that many poor girls have, through humiliation in many classes, quit school in the towns and cities throughout the state. A meeting has been called and a uniform style of dress adopted for the girls beginning the first of next October. The uniform will be on display in the store windows. A committee of seven ladies has designed it as follows: regulation white middie with detachable blue collar and cuffs; plaited navy blue wool skirt twelve inches from the floor. Stockings cotton, lisle or wool; shoes with Cuban or military heel in brown or black. Tie any color preferred."

Which leads to the following comment, supposing that the press notice records a historical fact:

As happened before with Prohibition, Bone-Dry, Sky-Blue Laws, Industrial Courts and other reforms, Kansas steps into the film light with a new style of reform dress. Other communities, jealous of Kansas and her place on the front page next to reading matter, have discussed, and some of them have actually adopted for High School and other commencements, some form of attractive but inexpensive garb for young ladies about to go out into the world to dress just as they like. But Kansas is the first state, so far as we know, to prescribe a uniform school dress where a "tie any color preferred" is a part of the regulation of the school board.

This saving clause still leaves Kansas in the list of free communities. The members of the school may all look alike "twelve inches from the floor." But what a rainbow of possible color and taste above the "white middie!" Helen can wear a tie of mauve; Jennie can choose heather blue; Alice is free to wear rose red; Sarah a modest gray; Mary can flame out in royal purple; Genevieve can get her father to send to New York for heliotrope dashed with lavender; Lucile can be patriotic and wear red, white and blue; Olive may appear with pure white, or a delicate shade of sea green; Agnes may try to eclipse all the others with a tie of Japanese gold; Hortense can relieve her uniform with flamingo stripes or peacock feather effects; Gwendolyn will be able to appear adorned under her chin with Minerva heliotrope or Cleopatra Nile green.

Three cheers for the Kansas School board, which leaves the "tie any color preferred" optional to the school girls. It is to be hoped, however, that this privilege will not result in a great increase in tardiness, as Helen and Alice and Hortense may be tempted to linger longer than is safe before the looking-glass, giving the last finishing touches to the "tie, any color preferred." We earnestly commend to the committee of seven ladies who designed the uniform that they take this possibility under grave consideration. It deserves careful thought.

The Children and Ourselves

WHEN Froebel wrote his famous motto, "Come, let us live for the children," he builded better than he knew. As we look upon the face of childhood and realize that the responsibility of character-forming in that little being rests largely with ourselves; that its endowments will be either good or evil according as we stamp upon the tender minds our own imprint—when we are thus conscious of the power of example, we can then begin to understand our own need of readjustment and spiritual cleansing before we essay such a task.

Nothing that lives is so pure as the heart of a child. It is unconscious of evil; its love is wholly unselfish; its friendships are artless and genuine; its pleasures are unalloyed; its trustfulness dreads no deceit. Those early years are the best for the beginnings of soul training, first at the mother's knee and, later, at the Family Altar. Those who have knelt with age and youth together, and have heard the simple, confident petition lisped by the youngest capable of worship, can never forget that prayer.

"Suffer the little ones to come unto Me," said Jesus, when the disciples were about to restrain the mothers who had set them before Him. We seem to see Him gathering that little group closer to His breast and gazing thoughtfully into their earnest, wondering faces, before looking up to the disciples and saying those memorable words which are the divine charter of childhood: "Forbid them not, for of such is the Kingdom of Heaven."

Have your children with you when you meet around the Family Altar. Tell them of God, of the Babe of Bethlehem, of Heaven and the angels. Tell them why Christ came to the world, and that He has promised to be with them as Friend and Comforter. Take them to church with you as soon as they can understand. Plant the foundation firm and strong in these young minds, and He Who has promised will not fail to keep them during all the years.

Table Suicide

WHILE over 3,000,000 human beings have been hungry in Central Europe since the war, and over 15,000,000 in China, and millions more in other parts of the world have been living on the smallest quantity of food necessary to maintain life, the people of the United States since the war have been "digging their graves with their teeth," and shortening life while adding to the hours spent at the table.

Gout and diabetes are almost unknown in Germany and Belgium, because the people in those countries had to practice a very simple diet during the war and are still living on plain and scanty food. In America, even during the war, there was little real self-denial in the matter of food, and since all restriction was taken off, gluttony has become the national sin of the physical life, just as greed in the market-place has become the sin of the nation in its commercial activity.

Gout, diabetes, kidney troubles, and arterial diseases are increasing with great rapidity, according to medical authorities, and the cause is over indulgence at the table. People are eating vast quantities of sugar in candy, and in sweetmeats. Enormous quantities of rich pastry and puddings are consumed in the big hotels. Fat and puffy citizens line the walls of the hotel lobbies, and the expensive restaurants are crowded at night with the swarms of theater-goers who have the habit of gorging heavy dinners at midnight. All over the nation there is an excess of eating.

If the figures were available, which is doubtful, it might be shown that the deaths annually from table suicide are in excess of all the deaths on the battlefield of the recent war. It is doubtful if even liquor has caused more real disease than over-eating. But in the nature of the case, it might be difficult to pass a prohibitory law covering the habits of gluttony. It is one of those human failings that can be corrected only by self-control.

Mel Estimates Federal Expenditures for Year at $4,550,000,000

AESTIMATE that the expenditures of the federal government would reach $4,550,000,000 in the next fiscal year and that it would be necessary to raise by internal taxes the sum of $3,830,000,000 or $250,000,000 more than is yielded at present, was presented by Secretary Mel in appearing before the Ways and Means Committee of the House to urge prompt revision of the revenue law. This estimate was so large that members of the committee were inclined to challenge it and to believe that radical savings in the conduct of the shipping Board and in other federal services would make it unnecessary to raise such a total.

Some of the new taxes proposed by the secretary of the Treasury met with little favor in the committee because of a certainty that they would be unpopular through the country. Particularly was this the case with a proposition to raise the letter postage rate to three cents, to impose a two-cent tax on bank checks and to place a flat tax of $10 on all automobiles, regardless of cost or horsepower. An increase in tobacco taxes also was urged, to yield $25,000,000, as well as an increase on the normal income tax of corporations from the present 10 to 15 percent. Transportation taxes would be cut in half, the excess profits tax repealed, and the income surtax brackets above 40 per cent. eliminated, with the surtax rates on incomes ranging from $6,000 to $50,000 increased, if the Secretary's recommendations were followed.

The task of revising the revenue law is an enormous one and as the new law is expected to stand for several years, the committee proposes to go carefully into all phases of the subject, so that the bill will not be ready for the House for some time.

Britain to Build Four Warships

THE British Admiralty's program for the building of four capital warships by 1925 has been approved by the House of Commons, the Admiralty having emphasized that its policy was not one of competition or challenge, but simply the replacement of obsolete ships. The four new ships are to be battle cruisers, carrying sixteen-inch guns and of the type of the Hood, the nation's only post-Jutland battleship.

Colonel Amery, Parliamentary Secretary of the Admiralty, declared the Grand Fleet had become in urgent measure obsolete, not only through the wear and tear of the war but as a result of the war's lesson, and called attention to the fact that Japan already has under construction eight ships of a type incomparably more powerful than anything afloat at the battle of Jutland and is voting money for eight more, while the United States by 1925 is to have twelve such vessels. He cited a resolution adopted by the recent conference of Premiers setting equality with the naval strength of any other Power as the minimum standard for the Empire, but declaring for delay in the working out of a policy of co-operation among the Dominions until after the holding of the Washington disarmament conference.

The debate showed a strong sentiment in favor of limiting naval armaments and a sincere desire that the conference proposed by President Harding should be successful, but the speakers felt that further delay on naval building might leave Great Britain in a position of definite inferiority on the seas, particularly since it was considered unlikely any other nation would consent to scrap war vessels already under construction.

Britain has notified the United States that any date favored by this government for the convening of the international conference on disarmament and Far Eastern questions will be acceptable to it, and Washington officials believed it would be possible to issue the call for Armistice Day, November 11, the date informally suggested by President Harding.

British Ship Seized as Rum-Runner

THE seizure just outside the three-mile limit off Atlantic City of the schooner Henry L. Marshall, flying the British flag and carrying a cargo of more than a thousand cases of whiskey valued at $140,000, has brought up some important questions in the enforcement of the Volstead Act and raised fears of international complications. The schooner was captured by the Coast Guard cutter Seneca, after her captain and mate had escaped to shore in a launch, leaving four members of the crew on board, and was taken to New York. Department of Justice officials feared the seizure was illegal if the schooner's transfer to British registry—she formerly was a Gloucester fishing vessel—should prove to be valid, and were at a loss as to how to deal with foreign vessels in such cases.

Federal officials declared that a fleet of at least eight vessels had been engaged in smuggling intoxicants from the West Indies in a gigantic conspiracy involving prominent men at various ports along the Atlantic seaboard. The vessels would anchor or cruise about near the coast while disposing of their cargoes to customers who went out to the rendezvous in small boats, and reports of such activities have been heard for several months. Naturally it will be difficult to pre-

She is the schooner Henry L. Marshall and was seized by a coast-guard cutter outside the three-mile limit while flying the British flag, suspected of being one of a fleet which has been carrying intoxicants to American shores. International complications are feared vent the smuggling of liquors if foreign ships can engage in such traffic with impunity, and officials were seeking an effective method of dealing with such tactics.

The Henry L. Marshall was the fourth vessel seized on charges of rum-running, but none of the cases has been settled as yet. In her case, action was deferred pending conferences with the British Embassy in Washington and an investigation by customs officials. A representative of the British Government attended the preliminary hearing in New York, but the British officials have given no indication of their attitude in the matter.

Steps Taken to Aid Russia

TEN Russian provinces, with a population of 18,000,000, are suffering from famine, according to a statement by M. Tchitcherine, the Soviet Foreign Minister, announcing that the Bolshevik government "will welcome all aid from every source and will disregard all existing political relations" in relief work. The disaster was attributed to a prolonged drought and it was declared the harvest would yield only 10 or 15 per cent. of normal with no reserves of food in the stricken district and with other provinces able to give only limited supplies.

The statement admitted that a great migration of the people to more fortunate districts was in progress, but asserted that it was under government direction and denied the reports which have been current that mobs numbering hundreds of thousands were marching on the cities. Such reports have predicted the speedy fall of the Soviet régime and have represented it as utterly disorganized, with the Red armies sent to check the migration turning against their leaders.

Following the receipt of a cablegram from Maxim Gorky transmitting the Soviet Government's acceptance of the terms laid down by Herbert Hoover on which relief would be sent, Walter Lyman Brown, European Director of the American Relief Administration, was instructed to proceed from London to Riga to deal with the Soviet authorities. Advances were received that the American prisoners in Russia had been released, in accordance with the first condition imposed by Mr. Hoover, and were proceeding to the border.

The French Government notified the United States that it stood ready to give every aid in its power to the project for feeding the starving, and asked for further details of the Hoover relief plan. Other nations also were considering how they could afford relief, but the breakdown of transportation facilities and the efforts of the Soviet officials to maintain their power at all costs make the problem one of tremendous difficulties. The question of inter-Allied relief measures will be one of the chief topics of discussion at the next meeting of the Supreme Council, called particularly to consider the Silesian controversy.

Dail Eireann Summoned

THE Dail Eireann, the Irish Republican Parliament, has been summoned by Eamonn de Valera and his colleagues to meet in Dublin to consider the British Government's Irish peace proposals, a step which marks a crisis in the negotiations. Earlier it has been said the Dail Eireann would not be convened until time for it to name plenipotentiaries to a London conference or until Ulster's attitude had been learned.

Statements regarding Ulster's position were conflicting, but if efforts had been made to bring about a meeting between Mr. de Valera and Sir James Craig, the Ulster Premier, they had yielded no results. In Dublin it was said that Ulster had been sounded and had returned an answer unfavorable to the Sinn Féin overtures, while in Belfast the officials declared the Ulster ministry had received no communication from Mr. de Valera. It might be that both statements were correct, any exchanges having been conducted through a third party, and informally.

Twenty-five members of the Dail Eireann have been held in prison because of their political activities, but the British Government decided on the release of all except John J. McKeown, under conviction of murder, in order that the peace negotiations might be continued under the best possible auspices. Extremist leaders bitterly resented his continued detention and threatened to break off the parleys.

Supreme Council in Session

THE meeting of the Allied Supreme Council which is beginning in Paris as this is written finds British and French opinion still far apart regarding the disposition of Upper Silesia, the chief problem to be considered. The experts who have studied the situation have agreed that the industrial district, for which Germany and Poland are bitter rivals, should not be divided, because to give the factory section to Germany and the coal mines to Poland would lessen seriously the productivity of the district. British opinion favored giving the district to Germany, while France was insistent on strengthening Poland, and each government feared to weaken its position at home by yielding ground.

Britain and Italy joined with France in presenting to Germany a formal request that the government take steps to facilitate the transport of Allied troops across Germany and the German Foreign Minister expressed a willingness to consent. France had threatened to take no part in the Supreme Council meeting unless her allies joined in such action, but the question of actually sending more troops to Silesia to enforce whatever boundary decision may be reached will be threshed out at the Council's sessions.

One suggestion for a compromise was that an autonomous district should be formed out of the disputed territory, a proposal unwelcome to each claimant but one which probably would be accepted in preference to seeing a hated rival win an outright award.

Colonel George Harvey, the American Ambassador to Great Britain, was attending the session and all concerned were watching his attitude with the greatest

Missionary Progress in Porto Rico

Snapshots of Protestant Achievements in the Island

By EDITH MARY IRVINE-RIVERA

PORTO RICO has been greatly blessed with good schools, good roads, and a great many other advantages ever since the Americans took possession of the island over twenty years ago.

Under the four hundred years of Spanish rule, Porto Ricans had few liberties of thought and speech, and the most meagre economic advantages—sanitary regulations were very lax, public instruction most inadequate, and commercial interests away behind the times.

But within ten years after the American flag was hoisted over the island, marvelous changes were noticeable in all phases of life. Among the many enterprises for good, the missions have done much to change the vision of things and establish better principles. Very soon after the Stars and Stripes was spread to the breeze, the Banner of the Cross followed and missionaries from all the leading denominations of the Protestant faith came to till the soil that had been lying barren for so many years.

The work of evangelization was outlined in a very practical way, and the island was divided off into sections. The Methodists took one part of the island, the Presbyterians another, and so on until the five or six leading denominations each had a territory, and took pride in witnessing larger and larger harvests year after year.

At the same time a beautiful spirit of unity and co-operation existed among the missionaries of all denominations, and as the years have passed a strong bond of brotherly fellowship has developed among the representatives of the mission boards, each one being solicitous for the progress and welfare of the others, and all combining their forces to make "Porto Rico for Christ" a reality.

EVERY denomination in the island has had a most interesting history, and all have brought about lasting good among the people. The Presbyterians, choosing the western point of the island, with San Juan as their headquarters, have spared no pains to tell the Gospel story, and do practical uplift work from center to circumference of their area. The theological seminary established for the benefit of aspirant preachers did a great work in preparing a force of well-equipped ministers to spread the Gospel story among their own people. It was started in Mayaguez some twenty years ago, but has since been merged into a union Evangelistic Seminary, situated at Rio Piedras, just opposite the campus of the University of Porto Rico, and its sole purpose is to prepare young men of all denominations for the ministry. At present its evangelistic team, composed of four students and two members of the faculty, is carrying on an enthusiastic campaign throughout the island. They travel from town to town in automobiles, and hold services in the churches to which they have been invited. Before many years these students will be filling the gaps in the Christian vineyard of their country, just as the graduates of that first Presbyterian Theological seminary are filling important posts in the mission work of Porto Rico today, and are proving what preparation will do.

The Presbyterian mission alone has 135 preaching places, with 34 preachers to look after them. It has 2,400 Sunday-school pupils, and twenty young people's societies, with a total enrollment of four hundred members.

Some of these mission posts are intensely interesting. There is the San German church with its beautiful church building and manse, its promising congregation, and live native pastor, Rev. Enrique Rivera. This town had been known as the mecca of Romanism in Porto Rico, but the work of the Presbyterian missionaries has changed the entire atmosphere; and the staunchest Romanists, who formerly classed all Protestants as non-believers, have been forced to confess that there is something in the practical Christianity the missionaries present, and so the Gospel message is touching the hearts of many. On the outskirts of this town is the Polytechnic Institute, founded by the Rev. J. Will Harris, who is gradually transforming

The Rider Memorial Hospital, in the clinic of which as many as 3,000 have been treated in a month one hundred odd acres of barren land into a great institution of learning for the youth of Latin-America. The institute started with twelve students some years ago, and today has 266 students, and a waiting-list.

A Porto Rican lace-maker, an industry the mission schools foster

The work of the more remote mission centers is also full of interest. Byron G. Sager is missionary at Lares, a mountain town. His circuit comprises nine mission posts, but he does not confine himself to these, as he finds that giving illused lectures from the Bible in the rude homes brings good results. At present there are about one hundred of these plebeian country homes that look forward to these instructive gatherings. Mr. Sager tells the story better than anyone else.

"My field covers Maricao, Las Mesas, San Sebastian and Lares," he says. "The special feature of our Lares work derives from the economical use of horseflesh—the magic lantern. It attracts her attendance and holds the attention a long time, so that the preacher has opportunity to teach simply and in a conversational tone a lot of things that would never find their way into a formal sermon. We seldom preach less than an hour and a half, and usually two hours, and have a conference afterwards for an hour longer. We try never to get in a hurry nor to leave any person without his share of the question he wanted to ask, nor to leave without having awakened questions in his mind to ponder over as occasion offers. This week I have been riding with Rev. Pagan through the barrios of San Sebastian, and we have spent at least 64 hours among the people."

THE American Missionary Alliance is doing another great work here under the Congregational church. The Blanche Kellogg Institute of San Juan furnishes a good interdenominational Christian school for young women who can pay only a moderate tuition fee. Under Dr. and Mrs. Harry C. York is an institution that has progressed remarkably, and a number of well-equipped and fully consecrated young women have been graduated from the school and have taken up trained-nursing, missionary work and teaching.

The Fairbanks Settlement, which is a department of this institution, is doing a great work among the poorer classes. Miss L. E. Fairbanks has given some ten years of untiring service to this work. Sewing and cooking classes and mothers' clubs have been established, and out of the work of the settlement has grown the Child Welfare Society, an organization started to help diminish the high rate of child mortality in the island, by providing milk and medical care for the poor children. This is the first organization of the kind in Porto Rico, and already has become an insurance enterprise, backed up by the leading people of the country. Perhaps no one has given more self-sacrificing service in Porto Rico than Miss Fairbanks, who has steadily won her way into the hearts of the people, and is constantly being encouraged by good results from her daily visits.

The missionaries under the Congregational Mission board are accomplishing great things over on the southeastern side of the island. There is a neat, white building adorning a hill just out of Humacao. It is the Rider Memorial Hospital. In this little center of first-aid to the sufferer there is more to see in a minute than one could see all day further off in the town. Dr. and Mrs. Maximilian Schurter are the founders of this work. She, the mother of five happy children, kept the home together, and served as matron in the hospital, often having to sit up all night and watch patients, while the nurse slept.

The hospital is the outgrowth of a medical missionary work started by Dr. Schurter when he opened clinics in Humacao, Fajardo and other towns in that part of the island. He realized, as many have, that the great need in Porto Rico was proper medical treatment for the hundreds who suffer and die simply because they are unable to pay for an operation or for medicine, and so he finally saw his task consummated in the establishing of this beautiful little place through which the freezing blow continually, and to which those bereft of hope and spent with pain may come and be healed. There have been as many as three thousand patients in the clinic of this hospital in one month. All this has meant untold sacrifice, but some unaccountable something has given to Mrs. Schurter strength to keep the night watch, thus being not only the light and impetus of their home but the pillar in time of need in the hospital. And something not born of

The Virtue of Simplicity

A Sermon by REV. STEPHEN SEWELL ESTEY, D.D.*

TEXT—Matt. 6 : 28, 29. "Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin: and yet I say unto you, That even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these."

SOLOMON'S glory! The story of that kingly splendor has thrilled the imagination of men. Recall that great throne of ivory overlaid with gold, with its six steps mounting up, guarded by twelve lions, two on each step. "There was not the like made in any kingdom," comments the ancient historian in breathless ecstasy of admiration. And who can adequately describe those royal robes made of purple and fine linen from Egypt, and gold from Ophir? The garments of the famous Queen of Sheba paled before the splendor of Solomon's raiment, to which Arabia and Tarshish and the isles of the sea contributed their riches.

But look away now to another gorgeous pageantry. Out on the Galilean hills and meadows another splendor glows—the splendor of the wild flowers, of the scarlet lily, the brilliant tulip, the glowing narcissus. Luxuriantly, riotously, they grow, as though God had opened heaven's windows and showered down to earth unmeasured loads of heaven's glinting beauty.

Notice one of those lilies, and mark "how the three inner petals of the lily meet above and form a gorgeous canopy, such as art never approached, and king never sat under even in his utmost glory." No doubt it was the sight of this matchless canopy in a wayside lily that flashed into the mind of Jesus the thought of Solomon on his canopied throne. And the Man who was more sensitive to beauty than any other man who ever lived, gives judgment thus: The lily is more beautiful than the king's glory.

And, of course, it is. Put the lily under the microscope and mark the delicate texture of its petals. Beside it man's fairest weaves of silk or linen look coarse and rough and uneven. The looms of men produce no such beauty as do God's looms. When an old Scotchman was asked to look at a bit of heather under the microscope, he stood for a few moments in awed amazement at the beauty and delicacy of the flower which were suddenly revealed. Then he said, choking with emotion, "I wish I had not looked at it. It makes me feel bad to think of all those beautiful things I have been tramping over and crushing heedlessly all these years. I did not know before that a bit of heather was so wonderfully made."

SOLOMON'S glory! Consider it for a moment. Kings labored to produce it. Ships ploughed the sea toilsomely to bring it from afar. Slaves delved, and women spun to create it. A labored, artificial thing, woven out of men's toils and tears and suffering, was Solomon's glory. But the lily's beauty comes with the toilsome ease of all God's created beauties. It is the silent gift of light and air and moist earth—and God! It is simple and natural. Solomon's glory has faded like a dream. Moth and rust have turned his robes to dust. But the matchless lilies still bloom on the Galilean hills, and their splendor still gladdens the meadows.

I wish to speak of the beauty of the simple life as contrasted with the extravagant, ornate, artificial life. I want to talk about "Lilies and Solomon's Glory," and I hope that I may persuade some to say with the Christ, "Lilies are more beautiful than Solomon's glory."

Two men on opposite sides of the world, standing in conspicuous places, have given utterance to strong words concerning the simple life. Listen to the first, Frederick Gillett, Speaker of the House of Representatives, who says: "The way to make America is to turn back; to retrace our steps carefully till we come to that juncture in the development of our national point of view where a man and a woman found life good without the frills deemed so necessary today. The citizens of the land must discard the abnormal for the normal. And the old ideas, the ideas that we of New England are proud to call our own, the ideas of soberness and thrift, are the ones that will see the nation through the crisis of the present to a secure and prosperous future."

Listen next to King George of England, and mark the conviction that has come to one who views present-day conditions from a throne: "The foundations of national glory are set in the homes of the people. They will only remain unshaken while the family life of our nation is strong and simple and pure."

From America's legislative halls and from England's throne comes endorsement of Christ's dictum: "Lilies are more beautiful than Solomon's glory." Not in the extravagant display of citizens of a democracy, nor in the royal trappings of a throne, do the happiness and security of a nation rest, but in the simple, wholesome, honest lives of the people. If ever there was a time when this truth needed to be thundered forth, it is today. We are in a perfect whirlpool of extravagance.

WE MUST return to the simple life to restore poise and dignity to life and character. Somehow we must get it through to our minds that extravagance never yet made a soul happy. Women are no happier today in twenty-five-dollar shoes and fifty-dollar hats than they used to be in four-dollar shoes and five-dollar hats. Solomon's glory never yet ensured happiness. It was Solomon himself who proclaimed the tastelessness of such glory, and uttered that cynical chant which has voiced the disillusionment of worshippers of material things ever since his day: "Vanity of vanities, all is vanity!"

When Satan wishes to blind men's eyes so that they shall fail to see that the road to happiness bears the sign-board, "The Simple Life," it is usually gold dust that he throws in their eyes. Words of homely wisdom are those of old Daniel Quorn: "I do see it often, my friends! I've watched it for years. Here's a young fellow doing good in the Sunday school and other is more beautiful than cheap, unhygienic imitation of adult life and finery.

When I see the long rows of automobiles in front of our high schools these days, I say to myself, "Some one is robbing these lads and lassies of the long brisk walk under trees turning to golden glory under Autumn's magic wand, robbing them of the thump and pound of rushing blood with which the exhilarating walk or run feeds the brain cells, robbing them of lithe limbs and health-tinted cheeks." I grant grudgingly that automobiles may help us adults to rush a little faster in the performance of our tasks, but I can't help but question whether they are not the enemies of children, veritable robbers of childhood. The simple life of the old New England home, as I recall it, with its run to school through the stinging cold, its homely "chores" in the home, its evenings at the fireside with the family and great books, was better far for the child, in my judgment, than all the Solomon's glory with which we are loading him today.

What an accumulation of useless things and useless work we have too often allowed to dominate our homes and weigh our lives into drudgery. The war taught us how to simplify our meals; it would be a pity to forget that knowledge. A dinner served in six or ten courses, at cost of nerves and muscle and pocketbook and wasted food—why is it any better than a simple dinner, apart from the fact that we have shackled our lives with the burdensome custom of serving it so? Why, pray, should we allow ourselves to be whipped into the expense and the worry of changing styles of dress so frequently at the dictate of manufacturers whose sole aim in the matter is to transfer money from our pockets to theirs?

WE SHALL be helped in our efforts to restore simple living in America if we can realize that there is something essentially cheap in the effort to outshine others in extravagant display. That was a sharp but well-merited thrust which the Philosopher, Solon, gave the rich Croesus, King of Lydia, when the monarch called him in to admire his splendor as he sat in royal apparel on his golden throne. "Have you ever beheld a spectacle more magnificent?" asked the king, greedy of admiration. "Yes," answered the man of great mind, "there is neither a pheasant in our fields nor a peacock in our courtyard that does not surpass you in glory." Man, made in the image of God, should seek his superiority and empire in the realm of spirit, not of things. We belittle ourselves when we allow ourselves to become the slaves of things. Our spirits ought to scorn such slavery.

An English lady went to the noted physician, Sir Deryck Brand, for treatment. The worry incident to the care of her big establishment and her social duties had fretted nerves and mind until she was a nervous wreck. "Here is a prescription for you," he said. "See a few big things. Go to America and see Niagara Falls. You will like to remember when you are worrying about pouring water in and out of tea-cups that Niagara is flowing still!"

In the matter of amusements America must return to simplicity, too. We are told that Americans are amusement mad, and sometimes it seems as though the charge were true. Long ago Xerxes, the Persian monarch, living among the luxuries and extravagances of a royal court, offered a reward to the inventor of a new amusement. The incident mirrors the restless, discontented heart of seekers after artificial pleasures in all ages. We must have something new, a new thrill! And so we go from extravagance to extravagance, from absurdity to absurdity.

What we need to re-learn is that natural, simple pleasures are the most satisfying, and that they best re-create exhausted bodies and minds. Some one has remarked that every time he reads Carlton's "One Way Out," he learns a new way to be happy without its costing anything, and it helps him to save at least five or ten dollars every month. Ways to be happy without its costing anything—thank God they are all about us!

Solomon's glory costs so much! It costs dear in labor and worry and tears and nerves and muscles. Is it worth the heavy price many pay for it? Simpler dress, simpler food, simpler amusements—how they would wipe out at one stroke most of the worries that harass our bodies, minds and souls! But lilies—they may be had just for the plucking. Lowell wrote,

"Bubbles we buy with a whole soul's tasking;
'Tis heaven alone that is given away."

Poor, deluded mortals that we are! Who will open our eyes to see that lilies are more beautiful than all Solomon's glory?

No prayer about it, no asking the Lord what He do see. No thinking about the Lord's work. 'I must get on,' he says, and he says it so pious as if it was one of the ten commandments—but tisn't, friends, tisn't, though you hear it so often!"

We cheapen and vulgarize our lives by thinking that money value necessarily makes things beautiful or worth while. That a thing has cost much, does not prevent its being ugly. If we could but see with eyes unprejudiced by custom, the dainty cotton dress might often appear more beautiful than the showy silk one, the strong simple chair of beautiful wood more attractive than the ostentatious one of plush. For sheer artistic beauty, I dare to match the big, clean, quiet, sunlit kitchen and living room of our grandfathers' farms, with its wooden floor scoured white, its cheerful, open fireplace, its polished pans upon which the sunlight glints, its blooming plants and its easychair in the sunlit, dimity-curtained window, against the city parlor, stuffy with expensive draperies and heavy furniture and cluttering bric-a-brac.

THE vulgarity of American wealth is the subject of frequent jest abroad. Perhaps we shall see ourselves as others see us some day, and learn that our ostentation makes ridiculous, that beauty lies in simplicity, not in ornateness. Perhaps some day we shall realize that our little school-girl daughters are ridiculous, not beautiful, in their French heels and silk stockings and showy dresses and rouged cheeks and elaborately dressed hair. Perhaps some day we shall see that girlish simplicity in dress and life and manner

Songless Birds

SUNDAY. Psalm, 51 : 12. "Restore unto me the joy of thy salvation." There is a most arresting difference between a singing bird and a bird which has no song. Even fine feathers offer no adequate compensation for the absence of song. I have sat in a wood which was thronged with semi-tropical birds in gayest attire, and it seemed like Westminster Abbey at other times than the hours of worship, when it is crowded with moving visitors, but the organ and choir are silent, and there is no sound of praise. A wood with a singing thrush in it, or a robin, or a nightingale, is transformed. The gloomy twilight becomes a dim religious light, and the wood becomes a temple. A bird with very plain feathers is a very fascinating creature if it is endowed with exquisite song. Yes, song is very captivating. I have known a country road thronged with people after darkness had fallen, and they had gathered to hear a nightingale sing.

And all this leads me up to a very challenging word about religion. Does not the religious life become fascinating only when it has found a song? Does not piety become arresting only as it breaks into praise? Does not spiritual devotion become alluring only when duty is changed into love, and harsh obedience ripens into joy? If religion has no joy, it has no vital contagion. If it has no joy, it has no glow in its own heart, and it lacks the power to kindle fire in others. A joyless religion is like a dripping wood, with a drenched bird or two on its branches, but with no quickening song at the heart of it.

And such was the plight of this Psalmist. He had lost his song! He had lost the joy of the divine communion. The fire of devotion had somehow smoldered, and everything was dull and gloomy. When he sought the Lord, there was nothing of the lover's thrill in his going, but rather the mood of a slave turning again to his monotonous task. He went moodily. There was no eager sprightliness in his steps, because there was no joy in his heart. His prayers were devoid of praise. His petition did not rise like a lark to the accompaniment of "melody divine." Somehow, he had lost his song, and all his ways were heavy.

It had not been always so. In other days, his joy in God had set his steps to music. "I will sing of mercy and of judgment!" "I will sing aloud of Thy righteousness!" "I will sing praises unto the Lord!" "O come, let us sing unto the Lord a new song!" He had known what it was to crowd God's gates with thankful praise. He would begin the day with singing. "My voice shalt thou hear in the morning, O Lord!" And snatches of song mingled with all the labor and interests of the day. Ay, even God's statutes had become his songs in the house of his pilgrimage.

How had he lost his song? Who knows how songs are lost? Perhaps by sheer thoughtlessness. Perhaps by neglect. More likely by sin. Joy and sin can never be in concord. When we are in ways of sin we may manufacture something which looks like joy, but it is not the real thing; it is only galvanized, it is not vital. It is not the joy of the Lord. We cannot keep the bird-note when our purity is lost. Joy flees away in fear when a loathsome thing comes into the soul.

And so this man turns to the Lord for the purity he had lost, that in recovered purity he might find the lost joy. "Create in me a clean heart, O God, and renew a right spirit within me." That is the first step to the restoration of joy. First, the lost health, and then the lost song. The chords will vibrate again when they have been cleansed and refined by God's holy grace. And where else can we turn for cleansing, but to the Fountain of holiness? And we do not turn in vain. The way to the Fountain is cheery with words of promise. "They shall return, and come with singing!" "They shall rejoice even with joy and singing; and sorrow and sighing shall flee away." When the Lord has taken from our souls everything that defileth, we are a new creation. "Lo, the winter is past, the rain is over and gone, the flowers appear on the earth, and the time of the singing of birds is come!"

The Purpose of Life

MONDAY. John 18 : 37. "To this end was I born and for this cause came I into the world, that I should bear witness unto the truth." Within the last few years two books have been written, one by a distinguished American, the other by an equally great Englishman. They are autobiographical, but depressing. Neither of these men seems to know whether he has lived in vain. The deep meaning of life seems to have escaped both.

Nineteen hundred years ago, there was on earth One who was conscious of a distinct message and ministry. He was never in doubt as to the purpose of His life. As early as twelve years of age He became conscious of His mission and thereafter never got out of sight of it. Before Pilate, He put that conception into memorable words, "That I should bear witness unto the truth."

It is well for us to know what truth is, and what it is to bear witness. Truth is a thing of relationship. Physical truth is a matter of physical relations, moral truth a matter of moral relations. God's Fatherhood, human brotherhood, the possibility of forgiveness, these are moral truth. How much of the Christian Gospel relates to these three truths! What is it to bear witness? It is to give testimony, to tell what one knows as to the case or cause at issue. That is exactly what Christ did. His whole ministry is a testimony to God's fatherliness, and of ideal brotherliness. Even if He had said no word about God, men would have known He came from God for He was Godlike. So there was one man who knew the purpose of life, gave Himself to its achievement, and at the end could say, "I have finished the work Thou gavest me to do."

What has all this to do with us? Just this: He said, "Ye are my witnesses." What He did, therefore, we are to do—to know the truth and to bear witness to it. Moral truth is manifold, but there are two great truths the world deeply needs today. They are the same it needed when Christ was on earth. We need to know and proclaim the fatherliness of God and the kinship of men. There is no better way to discover the purpose of our presence in the world than to recognize the stewardship of life. No one of us is his own. We belong to one another and to Another. C. C. A.

Crises Reveal Character

TUESDAY. Matt. 27 : 32. "And as they came out, they found a man of Cyrene, Simon by name; him they compelled to bear his cross." It is the glory of history and to the credit of humanity that when a man is needed, he can be found. Simon took up the cross of Christ because he had to; but later on, he must have taken it up because he loved to. Whereas at first he walked in the way of the Master unwillingly, he afterward walked that way most willingly. Do we not read that his two sons, Alexander and Rufus, became known throughout all the Church as the followers of Jesus?

Studying the beacon lights of progress and the epochal days of a forming civilization, we learn that always when the hour struck and the moment came, "they found a man." China needed a man and she found Morrison; Africa, and she found Livingstone; America and lo, there was Lincoln! And so the record runs all through the ages, in realms of the religious and secular, eloquent of the fact that a man, a woman, a leader, a pioneer, a pathfinder was found.

It is true in the sphere of the everyday walk and commonplace of daily existence. People passing along a dimly lighted street at night are scarcely more than moving shadows in our sight. But out from some brilliantly lighted window, a pouring stream of illumination reveals them as individuals. Thus do the supreme moments of life discover for us our neighbors, and we learn that the butcher, baker and candlestick-maker are really angels unawares. The tramp in a moment becomes a hero, as he risks his life to save a little child. The man next door, whom we thought indifferent, becomes a friend in the time of need. The autocratic woman across the street becomes democratic in the crisis of epidemic. When a cross-bearer is needed, rest assured the place is not vacant over-long. If we look long and earnestly, we shall find a supply for the insistent need, and a candidate for the challenging office. R. B.

Two Triumphs Contrasted

WEDNESDAY. Matt. 21 : 19. "Hosanna to the Son of David!" No earthly triumph was ever celebrated with greater pomp and circumstance than that of Aurelian when he returned from his victorious campaign to assume the Roman crown. The procession was led by twenty elephants, followed by sixteen hundred gladiators devoted to the cruel sports of the amphitheatre. Then came the arms and ensigns of the conquered nations, which were followed by their ambassadors bearing the crowns of their respective sovereigns, to be laid at the Emperor's feet; after that a long train of captives in chains, chiefest among whom was Zenobia, the beautiful Queen of Palmyra, in fetters of gold; and finally Aurelian in his magnificent chariot, attended by the Senate and a long detachment of the Roman Guard. So came the Emperor to his throne!

Compare with that the so-called "triumphal entry" of Jesus into Jerusalem. Was ever greater contrast? Yet the glory of Aurelian is an empty name today; while the Man in homespun has been the outstanding figure in the history of the intervening centuries. And the time is coming when kings and potentates shall with one consent, cast their crowns before His feet and crown Him Lord of all! D. J. B.

Testing-Time

THURSDAY. I Pet. 1 : 7. "That, the trial of your faith . . . might be found unto praise and honor and glory at the appearing of Jesus Christ." Testing times are sure to come in every Christian experience. Often, as in the case of the two chosen disciples, Peter and John, they are so sudden, and so intense, that we go down before them. All their boasted constancy, loyalty and courage, were as nothing, and tumbled in ruins. But their failures were before they had clearly apprehended the Christly point of view, or gained a true conception of His mission. When they had learned this, and had given His spirit full control of their lives, they were able to stand the severest tests without wavering in faith and loyalty to their Master.

Every one of us will have our testing-time. It may come to us with an all-too-sharp suddenness and from an unexpected source. There will be safety for us only in a steadfast loyalty to and intimate fellowship with Him, whom we profess to love and serve. It will be our close connection with Him that will give us of His strength to meet every test that comes.

Ambition, the struggle for wealth, position, preferment—we do not have to look far today in the leadership of the church, or in our own natures to discover these weaknesses, and their consequences. Who of us has not known defeat in this soul-struggle? Jesus' remedy for these shortcomings, and failures of the spirit, is to give our whole lives, as did the twelve, to a complete devotion, and utter unselfishness, and even to a sacrifice of life itself, to the redemption of a lost and sinful world. No discipline, no system of methods in Churchism, can take the place of the Christly examples, "Ye went about doing good!" W. S. S.

Finding Triumph Even in Defeat

FRIDAY. Matthew 26 : 74. "Then began he to curse and swear, saying, 'I know not the man.'" Peter, in his self-confident, boastful manner, had said: "Though I should die with Thee, yet I will not deny Thee." It was his habit to contradict the Master, saying often, "Not so, Lord." He had done this when Jesus was speaking of His coming death, and of washing the disciples' feet. How much better is trust than unbelief. We are always in danger of falling away when we follow afar off and get out of touch with Christ, or when we sit down in the seat of the scornful, and visit with the enemies of Jesus, virtually becoming one of them.

Peter evidently had given up the new kingdom of the Messiah as hopelessly lost. At such a time one is saved only by hope and faith. No one will stand for a religion which he believes is falling down into the grave.

Philosophy, reason, science and prejudice have buried our Lord many times, but He arose again and attended the funeral of all the theories of unbelief. Voltaire boasted: "It required twelve men to found a religion which it will take only one man to destroy." According to his doubt, so it was unto him. As sure as Christ is God's, Christianity will triumph, for every past apparent defeat has proved but a new beginning. E. W. C.

The Reinforcements of Omnipotence

SATURDAY. Hebrews 12 : 1. "Wherefore seeing we are also compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses." How heartening these words! We are not alone. No soul is solitary. The globe is girdled with co-workers. The preacher in the rural hamlet, the missionary in the foreign field, the teacher on the frontier—miles separate them, but ideals unite them.

Many people are strangers to each other. The people of God are one family. God is everywhere and everywhere is His abode. When moral purpose becomes only a trickle, let us remember that somewhere, men and women of the army of the holy endeavor and righteous purpose are fighting the same battles, facing the same conditions, confronting the same problems.

Heaven, too, is ready to encourage and send the strength of its reinforcements. The reserves of God are unlimited. The storehouse of the Almighty can never be emptied. In the time when Israel was in the dark, when the people were under the yoke, when all seemed to be lost, we read: "And suddenly there was with the angel a multitude of the heavenly host." Shepherds were not startled in the midst of their midnight vigil by one angel, but by a multitude of the heavenly host. It has always been like that and will always be like that. When the night is darkest the gleam shines brightest. Jesus lives and reigns. "Who were at church this morning?" asked a shut-in of the pastor. His answer might have been one of losing faith and pessimism. He might have enumerated the little group who had attended service. Instead, his answer was, "All the shining ones!" When men seem farthest, God is always nearest. R. B.

From Asia to Europe

International Sunday-School Lesson for August 28
Acts 15:36 to 16:18

By REV. SAMUEL D. PRICE, D.D.

WHEN continents are compared with reference to the progress of Christianity it must be remembered that Europe had about 1900 years start over Africa. This evangelistic journey of Paul to Macedonia and beyond is of fascinating interest to those who live in America, for had the "call" been to India or China we might be in need today of those who would tell us of Jesus Christ. Our thankfulness for the obedience of Paul carries an obligation for us to go and do likewise.

Divine leadership is clearly shown as the Holy Spirit shut doors of apparent opportunity in Asia, particularly in Mysia, Bithynia, and even in Troas. There were people with great needs in all these places and Paul had the same wonderful message that is recorded in the Golden Text: "Believe on the Lord Jesus, and thou shalt be saved." Paul was eager to speak in any of the provinces en route or to remain in them for a blessed ministry, but God was ready in His abounding love to open up a continent to him. This preacher to the gentiles does not appear to be restless meanwhile. Rather he is obedient even to silence until the great door, and effectual, Europe, is opened by the hand and power of his heavenly Father.

Meanwhile valuable work had been accomplished in the region of Phrygia and Galatia. For special study as to the location you can have the class historian and class geographer report. Learn the opinion of Sir William Ramsay in his great books concerning that part of the country. Later the epistle to the Galatians was written, and a very large section territorially was doubtless included. Then Paul and those with him were learning to journey as did the children of Israel when they obeyed the Pillar of Cloud. When this habit has been once acquired one knows that he can be accomplishing the will of God equally as well when waiting as when going. "Anxious thought for the morrow" has no place in the life of the Christian whose duty it is to cast his every "anxiety upon Him, because He careth for you." Read what Rev. F. B. Meyer, D.D., says, and he will be in the United States when this lesson is studied, "Whenever you are doubtful as to your course, submit your judgment absolutely to the Son of God, and ask Him to shut every door but the right one." If your problem is to come to a climax on Saturday do not be overconcerned about it on Wednesday, or even on Friday. Remember that those who wait for Jehovah have the wonderful experiences (Isaiah 40:31 R. V.).

WHILE Christ prayed the fashion of His countenance was changed and the Transfiguration took place. Paul must have been in prayer that night in Troas. Luke, Silas, Timothy and even others may have been with him asking he further will of God. Then came the man of Macedonia in the vision and delivered the message of appeal. One never need feel lonesome when wakeful at night. Prayer can always be enjoyed and the divine fellowship will be realized. God is ever ready to speak to His children. Too often in the busy daytime we do not take time to listen to His messages. The wireless operator gets his receiving instrument in tune with the sending one and then just listens. Without having them indicated here look up all the recorded instances when Paul had a blessed vision of comfort or instruction. Few facts are more significant in the life of Paul than the occasions for these talks from Heaven.

Doctor Luke, who wrote the Acts, joins Paul's party at Troas. Observe the words "we" and "us." Other "we" sections, as they are called by the Bible exegete, are Acts 16:10-17; 20:5 to 21:18; 27:1 to 28:16. If Paul especially needed a physician at this time he shows a quick recovery as he leaps into the work in Philippi, Berea, Athens and Corinth. The companions of the preacher seem also ready for the summons to the new fields for service. "Straightway" all start for Macedonia to preach the gospel. Consequences evidently are not considered. To obey immediately the call of God is their only concern. Paul was always equally the servant of the Most High. Sometimes he experienced "contrary winds." This time he could go forward with a "straight course."

The praying place for the Jews in Philippi is not in a synagogue, for they seem not to have any there, but by the side of the river. This blessed spot is quickly located by the newly arrived preacher and he joins with those who gather to praise and petition Almighty God. New truths are eagerly listened to as the breadth of the Trinity is taught by this one who knows from his rich experience. Some people listen to criticize and others listen to learn. The man of Macedonia had turned out to be a group of women and among them was Lydia, whose heart was touched. This first convert in Europe was a forerunner of the marvellous work being done for womanhood today throughout this wide world. There can be no real civilization without a christianized motherhood.

Lydia does two things promptly: (1) She makes public confession of her faith through the sacrament of baptism. She will not be a secret believer in Him who was publicly crucified for her. Hers shall be a Christian household and every member is sought as a trophy for Jesus, her Saviour. (2) The grace of hospitality is expressed as not only Paul but the whole evangelistic company is constrained to abide under her roof. How different life is in these last days in this respect. This is a vacation month for many ministers, and churches have been having supplies. Now there are few prophet's chambers, such as the Shunamite prepared for Elisha. "Send the preacher to the hotel, if it is my turn to entertain, and I will pay the bill," is quite often the way the visiting messenger of God is provided for.

CHRISTIAN fellowship in the home did not make unnecessary the place of prayer. Thither the group continually resorted, and as often as they went the evil spirit in the unfortunate soothing girl cried out the great fact, "These men are servants of the Most High God, who proclaim unto you the way of salvation." The evil spirits know the truth for ages past and then some twentieth-century scoffer makes bolt to deny the Sonship of our Lord. How the devils must laugh at such modern propagandists! It is always unfortunate when people know so many things that are not true. While the devils have power the Son has greater power. Paul merely utters a command in the name of Jesus Christ and that evil spirit who knew, feared and trembled obeyed and came out of the maiden. All evil spirits do not cry out and make themselves known. They do, however, make slaves of those whom they possess. Christ can today make anyone a freeman in Him. Satan is cast out as Christ enters the human heart to fellowship and command.

To hear and heed your personal, individual Macedonian Call is the supreme application of this lesson. Calls differ, for God has a whole world that needs helping. It may be that your "call" is to remain at home and bear the heat and burden of the day locally and even within the confines of your own home. Home missions is equally as great for you as foreign missions, provided God has called you to the nearby field. It may be that you are the very one who is wanted at Point Barrow, Alaska, on the border of Thibet, in that far-away mission station in West China or in that place indicated in the letter which you just received. Samuel said, "Speak, for thy servant heareth."

Why The Mennen Company Published My Baby Book

DEAR ANNE:

I wish I could tell you how glorious I feel about my Baby Book, which The Mennen Company published for me last Spring. It's simply wonderful the way doctors and nurses and mothers are using it and praising it—thousands of them!

You know, all my life I have been using Mennen Borated Talcum in my baby work—on my own skin, too, for that matter. It has always seemed just the least bit safer than anything else. It's what I call a perfectly balanced talcum—the proper ingredients and the right amounts, so as to be antiseptic and soothing. I believe that is the real secret of its great success on baby's petal-like skin.

And then, when The Mennen Company introduced Kora-Konia I found something I had wanted for years. It really does give "quick relief" to an irritated skin—wonderful for chafing and prickly heat and similar afflictions. But what pleased me most is the way it soothes a poor little infant's skin suffering from diaper rash or scalding caused by involuntary habit.

I suppose it was because of wide experience with babies in my clinical work that The Mennen Company asked me to write my Baby Book. I may have been flattered a bit, but I did see a big chance to help the greatest number of mothers in times of distress.

I hope you will tell all your mother friends to write for their copies. It's the kind of book they would ordinarily pay a dollar for. But because I have mentioned Mennen Talcum a few times, The Mennen Company is mailing it for twenty-five cents as long as the edition lasts. It comes in a plain wrapper.

Lovingly,

BELLE

CHURCH BELLS SCHOOL

Ask for Catalogue and Special Donation Plan No. 86 THE C. S. BELL CO., Est. 1858, Hillsboro, Ohio

WHEN summer comes I find myself drifting, almost invariably, toward those streets that lie, like a grim shadow, in the midst of the city's darkness. I find myself driven, by the irresistible force of human sympathy, toward the breathless, heat-stricken area where the unfortunates of New York are forced—by poverty and the weight of circumstances—to dwell. And, as I wander through alley and byway, I see many heart-breaking pictures and come in contact with a vast number of pathetic personalities.

Some of the pictures that I see I have, from time to time, given to you. Some have been exaggerated—as stories often are—but some have run woefully true to fact. It has been the same with the personalities. I have drawn them, often, for your benefit—and with more or less accuracy. Some of them, however, I have never told about. Some of them I never will tell about!

The names that I use (this in answer to many a question)—are seldom real. But sometimes they are. The folk that I tell about are hardly ever people that I could locate for you—sometimes, in fact, they are composite portraits of more than one person. But often they are the clear and accurate descriptions of people who drift, ghostlike, across my path—people who are strays of the underworld.

It is to the children of the slums that my heart goes out at this time of year—and it is of these children that I most often write. For, at this season of the year, Mont-Lawn is open to them—at this season of the year I am able, by writing of them, to point a way for the lovers of all little children to help raise them above the shadows.

I am going to tell you today, and very briefly, about Rosie and Ted, about Conchetta and Benny the Rat, and Terrance. And you must remember, while I am telling you about them, that there are hundreds—yes, and thousands—of each one of them. And that there are thousands more that will go unclassified, and unnoticed.

I. ROSIE

ONE wonders, on seeing her, how she ever came by the name. For her face is pinched and unhealthily yellow, and her lank hair hangs in a discouraged way about her ears.

Surely no child was ever less like a flower. But—well, flowers need clean sunlight. And fresh air. And love. And Rosie has never known any of the three.

She lives in a tenement room with her father and her grandfather and three men lodgers. Her mother is dead. She sleeps with her clothes on, and when the morning light filters through the one narrow window of the room, she gets up wearily and eats a bit of dry bread (and a bit of sausage, too, if there's any left) and goes to the shop where she sews, until night-time, on blue denim overalls. And then she creeps wearily back to the room, and goes to sleep. Unless, maybe, she sits for an hour or two on the steps of the tenement house.

Rosie has never seen the country. But once, so she told me, she saw a basket of flowers. A man was selling them on the crowded corner where Essex Street meets Rivington. And they were made of red crepe paper.

II. TED

ONE wonders why Ted is so happy. He has little to make him happy, it would seem. For, despite prohibition, his father is a drunkard. And his mother is very glad, when there's trouble in the air, to leave Ted alone with his father. "Y' can't hurt a kid!" she says.

There are usually black and blue spots on the child's arms and back. And often one of his eyes is discolored. But he doesn't tell how he came by the bruises. One gathers only a hint, here and there, from his playmates.

I heard him singing, once, in a cheerfully shrill little voice, as I passed him on the street. I paused, for a moment, to catch the words of his song. It was something about "Mont-Lawn bells!"

Their Lives Need to Be Brightened by Contact with Nature

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

III. BENNY THE RAT

HIS father is "serving time." His father is a "dip," which, in the vernacular, means a pickpocket. His mother is—well, no one knows what has happened to his mother.

Furtive his face is. And pinched—giving him his nick-name. His eyes are sharp and more than a trifle shifty. Perhaps it's because he is always on the lookout for "cops" and the rest of a—to him—hated brotherhood.

He lives precariously. Some nights he sleeps in a "pal's" room; sometimes in a barrel or a doorway. Once he was almost arrested for stealing an orange, but the pushcart man wouldn't prefer charges against him—he was so small. And once the truant officer almost took him to the Children's Court.

His brief life has been eventful. But he has missed the big adventure. People laugh when they tell how he once tried to leave the city with a bundle of ragged clothing under his arm. He was going to find the country, but he didn't know how. So he came back again to the slums. People say that there were tear smudges on his furtive little face.

IV. CONCHETTA

SHE is Italian, and she is four years old. But she is so small and so thin that she would pass, quite easily, for two years.

Her family are very poor. There are many of them, and there is never enough food to go around. But the rest seem to manage, somehow. The rest are stronger than Conchetta—more able to fight for existence.

A gentleman, seeing Conchetta on the street one day, gave her a dollar. He went away, talking to himself.

"It's not right," he was heard to say,

its doors to both sexes. The enrollment now is nearly five hundred.

IF MISS ROBERTSON has a fad at all, it is in helping boys and girls. She and her mother took into their home sixteen girls whom they raised to useful womanhood and for whom they bought trousseaus when they were to be married.

In 1900, Miss Alice was made United States School Supervisor for Creek schools. She visited schools, audited accounts, looked after the appointment of teachers, prepared statistics, made quarterly and annual reports, and each summer handled two normal schools. Her work required her to travel in all kinds of weather over the Creek country, an area as large as the State of Connecticut and sparsely settled, but she was unafraid and gladly accepted the rude hospitality of Indian friends.

No other woman has left such an impress upon the great territory as has Miss Robertson. But her energies have not been limited to philanthropic channels and her success as a farmer has been marked. Her home "Sawokla" is a model of thrift. Here she is experimenting with the raising of Jersey cows, Duroc-Jersey pigs and Leghorn chickens. And another and still more remarkable venture of the new Congresswoman was Sawokla Cafeteria, which became her campaign headquarters. She combined business with politics and advertised and cooked her way into Congress, talking the campaign over with every man and woman who came into her cafeteria.

Like President Harding she conducted her campaign from her own premises. The votes came to her and she fed them well. As there was no Republican newspaper in the town she was denied newspaper support, except that which she paid for in advertising her restaurant.

"for a child to look like that. It's not right!"

And a visiting nurse once tried to explain Conchetta's condition to her bewildered Italian mother.

"Fresh air and plenty of food, at once!" the nurse said, "may save her. Nothing else will."

V. TERRANCE

TERRANCE is as Irish as Conchetta is Italian. Circumstance flung him and his widowed mother into the slum and circumstance is keeping them there—but even circumstances cannot make them forget their heritage of laughter and romance. Often, after dark, they sit on the roof of their tenement—they live eight flights up, nearest to the roof—and watch the dim stars. And his mother tells him about the "auld country" and the green fields and the trees and the smell o' peat on the air.

Terrance has often wondered whether all of the green fields and trees are in the "auld country." His heart is loyal to America, his adopted land—for he came to it as a wee baby—but he sometimes thinks that he would like to see the green field and trees, so he would! His mother makes them so very beautiful when she tells of them.

Perhaps, some day, a Settlement worker will climb the eight flights to their room under the roof. And then—if she does—I'm sure that she'll tell Terrance about The Children's Paradise. And, maybe, if it's possible—if there aren't more children than there's money to care for—Terrance will be shown that this land has, also, its quota of beauty.

Some day, perhaps, a Settlement worker will climb the eight flights. But so far none of them have gotten past the fourth.

(Note: If you want to help some other Rosie or Terrance or Ted or Benny or Conchetta to have ten days at Mont-Lawn and get a real breath of the country put your contribution in an envelop and mail it to Christian Herald marked for Mont-Lawn.)

The citizens of Muskogee were urged to try her cooking at the cafeteria and at the same time they were asked to send her to Washington to legislate for them. She declared that she was not capable of making campaign speeches, but when a voter came into her restaurant she would sit down and eat a bowl of soup with him and talk politics. In the advertisements of her restaurant she mixed Bible quotations and political arguments and interspersed with the daily menu were "heart to heart" paragraphs on the political situation which rivaled the news columns in interest. Her advertising copy was so varied, piquant and interesting that it was widely read and won her many votes.

The advertisements were mostly one column wide and from five to ten inches long, with a paragraph of philosophy, a flash of humor or a bit of pathos, then a scriptural quotation, to add interest.

Womanhood has been the keynote of the whole life of our only Congresswoman. She belongs to a species in public life almost unknown—for she believes every man and woman in the United States should mind his or her own business. She would not travel on Sunday, but she thinks reforms should come from within out, and will not lend her influence to punish those whose opinions happen to be at variance with hers.

"Religion does not mean the taking of all the joy out of life," she says; "it does not mean the fixing of a legal code of morals and when you attempt to legislate religion into a man you drive him from the church. If we follow the injunctions 'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart and with all thy soul and with all thy mind,' and 'Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself,' we will not get into trouble. When we love our neighbors as ourselves we shall not offend them."

this world has fired Dr. Schurter with an unflinching faith and indomitable courage which has made possible the great work of healing for the body and for the soul which is being carried on in the little hospital on the hill.

NOW come the Lutherans with their beautiful church and kindergarten school in Puerta de Tierra, an outlying district of San Juan. Rev. and Mrs. A. E. Ostrom are doing a great work in this region where sin and degradation of every kind prevail. The missionaries, Miss Probst and Miss Emma Schmid, with their kindergarten school and special clubs and classes, find satisfaction in seeing whole families transformed from a life of nothingness to a life of service.

Miss Schmid also works among the girls in Bayamon, a town across the bay from San Juan. Here she has started a lace-making school for the girls who have aptitude in that direction. She goes three times a week to this town. First she must take the ferry across the bay, which compared with our ferries of the northland looks like a toy boat. This ferry lands her at Cataño, a low-lying village on the opposite shore of the bay. Here she takes a queer little train with a very screechy engine which carries her to Bayamon in a few minutes, and after a little walk through dusty streets, she reaches the church where the girls meet in the Sunday-school room to learn to make lace.

It is interesting to watch the girls first learning to stick the pins around which the thread is woven in the design already stamped on the cardboard. Each step is taken with great care, and when they have become proficient in the rudimentary steps then they are promoted to something else. The lace is sent to the mainland, and sold, after which each girl is given the money for the lace she made. Miss Schmid has started a savings system in her lace school, and each girl has a tiny pass book. When she turns over her dainty pieces of lace to Miss Schmid, and is paid for it she puts so much of what she has made aside for her savings account, and before she knows it she has quite a sum laid away for the rainy day.

JUST a few blocks away from the Lutheran church and manse is the new Baptist church, on Ponce de Leon Avenue, which has just been dedicated. This beautiful property is the result of years of unswerving toil on the part of the missionaries in charge of the work. The pastor, Rev. Gerardo Davila, is a man with a message, and is carrying on a most needed work of evangelization in this district where sin of every kind is so rife. The new building is a combination of church auditorium and Sunday-school rooms, a manual-training school, rooms for a day school for the lower grades, and missionary's quarters. It means untold good for Puerta de Tierra, and for the people of San Juan in general.

And now let us imagine ourselves in the Condado, San Juan's aristocratic suburb, where we find a fine building and attractive grounds, the George O. Robinson orphanage for girls. This institution was started with two little orphan girls in 1906, and has been carried on by the Woman's Home Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal church ever since. It has now fifty girls and a constant and increasing waiting list, and under the skillful management of Mrs. Murray, widow of the late Dr. J. C. Murray, who gave the last years of his life to this work, it is producing capable Christian girls, who otherwise would have been brought up in vice and misery.

A book could be written about the work of all these mission fields throughout the entire island. These are only snapshots of a great crusade that is being launched against sin by God's ambassadors, who often seem to stand alone, and whose constant aim is to win Porto Rico for Christ.

The old swimming hole, with its captivating call to youth and vigor, may be only a memory—yet joyous vigor through advancing years can be aided by right food and drink.

interest, but it has been declared repeatedly that America would take no part in settling the Sillesian controversy. Other important questions to be considered were the Turkish situation and relief for the famine victims in Russia.

STEAMSHIP LOST ON PACIFIC COAST. The coastwise steamship Alaska went down off the northern coast of California after striking a rock during a fog and it was believed forty-eight persons had perished. Twelve bodies were recovered and the number of missing was placed at thirty-six.

SPANISH DEFEATS IN MOROCCO GROW. The disasters to Spanish troops in Morocco at the hands of rebel tribesmen have increased in magnitude and several detachments were reported to have been virtually annihilated. The defeats caused a parliamentary crisis in Spanish and efforts for a reorganization of the ministry were in progress.

FEDERAL COUNCIL UPHOLDS DISARMAMENT MOVE. The Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America has sent to President Harding a letter pledging its support to his efforts for an international disarmament conference, and at the same time issued an appeal to church federations and ministerial associations in 175 cities urging them to carry on a vigorous educational campaign on disarmament.

TO HELP CHURCHES IN ADVERTISING. The executive committee of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World has indorsed a suggestion from its Church Advertising Department that each local advertising club immediately appoint a strong committee on church advertising. These committees will call conferences of ministers and laymen interested in the better application of advertising to the needs of the Church, with the purpose of forming permanent councils on the subject, and it is hoped the combination of ministerial talent and advertising experience will bring great progress.

ENRICO CARUSO DIES. Enrico Caruso, world-famous tenor of the Metropolitan Opera Company in New York, died in Naples, Italy, at the age of forty-eight, following an operation. A severe illness had kept him from singing for many months, but it had been believed he was recovering rapidly, and when he returned to his native land in the spring it was with the expectation of being able to resume his accustomed rôles this autumn.

ANTI-TAMMANY TICKET NAMED IN NEW YORK. Representatives of various organizations in New York City hostile to the Tammany administration have agreed on a fusion ticket for the municipal elections this fall, with Henry C. Curran, a Republican, now Borough president of Manhattan, as their candidate for Mayor. State Senator Charles C. Lockwood, a Republican, will run for Controller, and Vincent Gilroy, a Democrat, for President of the Board of Aldermen.

PRESIDENT HARDING TAKES A REST. President Harding has been away from Washington for a few days of rest at the summer home of Secretary Weeks on Prospect Mountain, near Lancaster, N. H. En route to New Hampshire, he halted at Plymouth, Mass., to deliver an address to 30,000 persons at the Pilgrim Tercentenary celebration; and at Lancaster he made a short speech predicting that the moral leadership of the United States would bring about disarmament.

AIRSHIP TO FLY ACROSS ATLANTIC. The American navy's great new rigid airship, the ZR-2, just completed in England will start for the United States on August 25 carrying a crew of more than forty, according to a Navy Department statement. The craft is 695 feet long and has a lifting power under normal conditions of eighty-six tons.

"Beauty Is Only Skin Deep"

A GOLD BRICK always looks good. It has to. Its promising appearance is its sole virtue. Looks alone will not sell goods today. Merchandise with a name—the name of its maker—has the call. For only the maker of worthy goods can long afford to advertise. At the High Court of Public Opinion any other sort is soon condemned.

Wise manufacturers seek the good publications to tell the story of their wares. The publishers seek the reputable advertising for the readers' guidance. The well-informed buyer seeks news of good merchandise through the columns of the best publications.

This proves the value of advertising. Neither advertiser nor publisher can prosper without your patronage. Therefore, it is to their advantage to cater to you. They do it, too.

And it is distinctly to your advantage to be guided by the message they lay before you—the advertisements.

Read them regularly!

Young People's Topics for August 28

By REV. RICHARD BRAUNSTEIN

Conscience—Teaching It, Quickening It, Obeying It

E. L. Prov. 20:20-27

IN ACTS 4:13-20 we have an interesting story, which is likewise our second reference, concerning the man who was healed by Peter and John and how, when his benefactors were brought to trial, he stood by them. It was a beautiful manifestation of loyalty, appreciation and practical thanksgiving. Certainly the man's conscience could not prompt him to do otherwise. That is one side of the story. Here are Peter and John before their accusers defending themselves with the words, "For we can not but speak the things which we have seen and heard." That is the other side of our reference story. Both sides are an evidence of a taught, quickened and obeyed conscience.

Missionary annals and the chronicles of beneficial movements all through the ages are the narratives of the kind of conscience we are discussing. "Conscience" does not mean anything by itself. Everybody has a conscience. The word means "moral judgment," but the judgment depends on the "morality" of the person who does the judging. We would not depend for light and leading on a person who is unchristian in belief and therefore unchristian in action. But the person trained in Christian ethics may be depended upon for a sane viewpoint and judgment in the interpretation of the fundamental questions of life. There is such a thing as a trained as well as an untrained conscience.

Breaking the "Ten Words" involves more than the act, for there are by-products of consequences that are far-reaching. A commandment broken effects not only the breaker now but extends in a chain of influence that touches generations to follow. Try to imagine a world without the Ten Commandments. Imagine what a wonderful world this would be if every person consistently kept the commandments. What would happen in the next fifty years if every person obeyed the "new" commandment, which in the last analysis is the sum and substance of all the commandments. Suppose every person loved, had consideration for, manifested a deep regard for every other person, by loving everybody, even as Jesus Christ loved us all!

Life Sketches of Great Adventurers

B. Y. P. U. Luke 8:1-15

READ the book "Comrades in Service," by Margaret E. Burton. The lesson story is that of Chundra Lela, a child widow of India. The death of her husband made her an outcast according to the custom of the Brahmin religion. Was not his death a visitation of the gods? Contrast this way of thinking with the thought of Christian thinking. For years Chundra Lela wandered over India seeking peace of heart, subject to all manner of cruelty and the victim of all manner of hardship. Her story of adventure surpasses that of any story by a Stevenson or Balzac in their wildest flights of fancy. It is another one of those remarkable stories of the romance of missions and the gracious leadings of the good God. It was Julia Philips, a Baptist missionary who at last led Chundra Lela into the true way of peace and made it possible for her to spend her last days as a preacher of the "good news" of the Gospel, a work that gladdened many a sad heart and made the way plain to many a bewildered soul in that land of darkness and superstition.

Such stories inspire us, toughen our moral fibers, make us more determined to our part and consecrate us to save others who have as yet not found the clearing beyond the deep woods of pagan thought and the poisonous swamps of heathen practice. We can not read the story of Chundra Lela and other Great Adventurers without becoming the staunch supporters and loyal champions for the missionary cause.

The Ten Commandments in the Life of Today

C. E. Ex. 20:1-17

IN THE Epworth League topic we discussed "Conscience" and found that it needs training. The Ten Commandments are splendid teachings for this purpose. Let the Ten Commandment Habit be acquired in youth and we shall have no fear concerning the moral caliber of our business as well as social leaders, or of those who make up the rank and file of our nation. We can not find anything in the Ten Commandments that is not fundamental to the life of today among individuals and nations. The whole question of man's error may be based on the fact that the Ten Commandments play such a small part in the philosophy of the life of individuals.

The Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

MR. GEORGE T. B. DAVIS, the long-time associate of the late evangelist, Charles M. Alexander, and the founder of the Pocket Testament League, writes requesting prayers in behalf of the League in the new effort which it is preparing to put forth for a wider reading of the Word and for a world-wide Bible revival. Mr. Davis writes: "I have recently received a cablegram from Mr. W. Winn of Sydney asking us to come to Australia for Pocket Testament League campaigns. I feel this is the Lord's call, and the open door for a world tour for Bible Revival. The Bible Revival Party will include Dr. George C. Cossar; Miss Bertha Beebe; my mother, Mrs. E. A. R. Davis; and myself. We desire not only your prayers but those of your friends as well. If Australia and mission fields are to be mightily moved for God there must be a mighty volume of believing prayer back of the work and workers."

Mrs. N. E. H. writes: "I am a firm believer in prayer and I earnestly unite my prayers with the League. Please pray that my husband, who mysteriously left me some months ago, may return, or that I may hear from him. I can not account for his strange actions, as we had no trouble of any kind. Also pray that God will continue to give me faith and patience."

M. A. L., Conn. "I have a most trying affliction and at times am in despair as it causes such depression, unfitting me for my daily tasks. Now, may I ask for prayers to be offered for my poor mind? My physicians have failed to help me."

Mrs. C. C. writes: "An aged mother wishes to acknowledge that God does hear and answer prayer. My only son has been enabled to give up tobacco for three months. Please pray with me that he may also be entirely freed from the desire for it, and that if it is God's will, I may have the assurance while living, of his conversion and of meeting him in heaven."

Mrs. W. R. S. acknowledges answered prayer on behalf of her son, and asks that we may continue to pray for him, that he may hold to the faith and become a worker for the Master.

Among the general requests are the following: For health, 51; guidance, 6; happiness, 4; financial aid, 4; courage, 1; conversion, 24; wisdom, 3; prosperity, 2; reconciliation, 2; heart's desire, 8; blessing, 4; success, 4; bad habits, 10; position, 4; peace, 3; faith, 6; and spiritual advancement, 1.

Questions and Answers

H. McA., Brooklyn, N. Y. Pray for greater faith in God as the hearer and answerer of prayer. In all your petitions, ask that you may be led to pray in accordance with His will. Here is a little incident from the life of the great missionary, Adoniram Judson, which shows that no earnest prayer, offered in the right spirit, ever goes amiss. Dr. Judson was sitting by the side of his wife, in their missionary home in Burma, and he expressed deep sorrow because, although the Lord had marvelously blessed his ministry among the heathen, yet all his efforts to bring blessing to the Jews had gone for naught. His wife had in her hand a missionary magazine, and she turned to read the next article in it, which told the life of Dr. Judson, translated into German, had fallen into the hands of some Jews living near the Black Sea. So impressed with it were they, that they came to believe in Jesus Christ, and were sending an earnest plea that a missionary be sent to tell them more of the Gospel. Dr. Judson, overcome with emotion, said to his wife: "What you read frightens me. I find there has never been a prayer, there has never been a service that has not brought some answering result."

J. M., Danbury, Conn. Worldly pleasures, even the most attractive of them, are not enduring and can not give lasting satisfaction. At this time, when so many in every land are given over to indulgence, it can be said without exaggeration that about half the world is pleasure-mad. But it should not be forgotten that such pleasures have their reaction. They are empty, fleeting, and too often degrading. "Like the crackling of thorns under a pot, so is the mirth of the wicked," says the wise moralist in Ecclesiastes. On the other hand, there are pleasures that are lasting, whose influence will stay with us even to the end of life. It is well to weigh your pleasures and to reject those that savor of indulgence or dissipation, or that lead into doubtful associations. There are plenty of opportunities for enjoyment of the kind that leaves no regretful memories afterward.

Mrs. D. C., Cleveland, O. The Jews were God's chosen people, and Paul says (Rom. 11: 1) that He has not cast them off. Their ultimate return to the Holy Land is foreshadowed by the prophets. See Isa. 2: 2-4; Jer. 3: 18; 16: 14-15; Ezek. 36: 24; 37: 21, 25; and 39: 28. They may return in unbelief, but the assurance is given that they will be converted later and will ultimately accept Jesus as Messiah.

Mrs. G. E. G., Delavan, N. Y. Little is known of Paul's early youth and education, beyond what is stated in the Epistles, and that is fragmentary. It is made clear in Acts 27 that he was a native of Tarsus and a descendant of an honorable Jewish family of the tribe of Benjamin. Tarsus was the metropolis of Cilicia, a populous and wealthy city, 300 miles from Jerusalem. It had a synagogue at which Saul doubtless was a pupil. Later he studied in Jerusalem under the famous teacher, Gamaliel. He was rigidly trained in all that related to the Jewish laws and ordinances, and in early manhood joined himself with the sect of the Pharisees, the strictest of all the Jewish religionists and the strongest opponents of Christianity. In accordance with the Jewish custom, he was taught a trade—that of tent-maker. In time he became an ardent religious zealot, and united with the forces that were persecuting Christianity. He was with those who opposed Stephen and held the garments of the men who made the fatal attack and brought about the first Christian martyrdom. The New Testament record tells how Saul took a leading part in the plots of the zealots to blot out the new religion, and how he was commissioned by the Sanhedrin (of which some authorities hold he was a member) to lead the movement against the new religion in the district between Jerusalem and Damascus. It was while he was on one of his persecuting expeditions that he saw the miraculous vision which resulted in his conversion. There are many volumes dealing with the life of Paul, which you will find listed in the religious encyclopedias.

This cheering letter comes from a reader in Bloomington, Illinois: "I do not want to be guilty of ingratitude by silence. Hence, permit me to express appreciation of the spiritual help afforded by the Daily Meditations and by the excellent selections of Sermons in your paper. Also I find the Mail-Bag helpful in solving perplexities. I do not know from what source I could receive more help of this nature."

M. S. T., Albion, Pa. The use of the ring in marriage is very ancient. It was the ceremonial custom among the Romans before the introduction of Christianity, and also to some extent among the Jews, to give the betrothed maiden a ring at the time of espousal. The Greek Church made it a special ceremony. The use of the wedding ring was adopted by the early Christian Church, and has been observed ever since, with varied ceremonial forms, by all the bodies of the Church. The ring, according to some authorities, is the symbol of eternity and constancy.

B. N. F., Pittsburgh, Pa., writes: "I was interested in reading what Arthur Meachen of Norwalk, England, writes about a little leaflet touching the heart of John Bunyan. I want to say that no one can tell the great good that can and has come from the distribution of tracts and leaflets. I know they had a large place in making me what I am. I was brought up in a different religion than that of which I am now a member. I did not read the Bible, in fact, I did not know much of it, except that it was a book with pictures. My father had a very fine one in two volumes but I only used to study the pictures. That was when I was sixteen. What brought me to the reading of the Bible when I was quite young was seeing children's story books displayed in bookstore windows with a large picture of Joseph being sold by his brethren on one leaf, and the reading on the other side. I would stand in front of the window and read those books every time I saw the leaves had been turned. After a while I found out they were taken from the Bible. Speaking of tracts, I used to read every one I could get hold of and I liked them and they did me a lot of good. I have since given out hundreds and I know some did a lot of good, too. All my folks, except one brother, are now Protestants and have been for many years. In fact, we all held offices in a Methodist Mission Church before I was twenty. When about twenty-one, I went to England and in about a year, was one of the leaders of the Williams Street Wesleyan Mission band of Woolwich in Kent."

Our friend who writes the above is one of many who can testify to the value of Bible tracts and leaflets in soul-winning. A good example and worth following.

M. H., Coffeerville, Miss. 1. The passage in Rom. 11: 29: "The gifts and calling of God are without repentance," is held by the best authorities to mean that the act by which He "called" Abraham to be the father of a "peculiar people," and the "gifts," with which He endowed the patriarch through the articles of the Covenant made with Abraham were and are irrevocable and not subject to change or "repentance." The meaning is that Israel, although it had been an enemy to the Gospel, is beloved of God "for the fathers' sake," and hence there can be no regret or withdrawal of the divine power. The passage quoted is a free expression of Paul's confidence in the ultimate bringing of the Jews. 2. In the passage in Hebrews 8: 10, 11, we find the same gracious attitude of divine favor toward the Jews emphasized. Far from withdrawing His love from them, he will increase it by granting a new and better covenant with the same ultimate end in view. And He would write it on their hearts, so that they would not have to teach it for all would understand. 3. The passage in I Peter 3: 19, 20 is one that has been greatly discussed. It is generally interpreted as meaning that the preaching to the spirits "in prison" implies not the preaching of the Gospel, but the announcement of Christ's finished work. Nor does it imply a second day of grace. The spirits were clearly those of the Antediluvians. The passage, however, is mysterious and has puzzled Bible students. Peter is the only Bible writer who mentions the occurrence, whatever it may have been, so that there are no other passages to shed light upon it.

The Symbol of Sacrifice

They sat in an alcove in the hallway. The sound of successive encores came to their ears. Oris was young and impressionable.

"You must let me come and see you," he urged gravely.

CLAIRE turned rather nervously away, fingering some letters lying unopened on a small side table nearby. She gave a little start.

"Why, here's a letter addressed to me," she told him. "It must have come while I was out this afternoon. It's not stamped either. Will you excuse me?"

She ripped it open, puzzled by the unfamiliar handwriting.

"Miss Claire," she read, "I'm so sorry about the telegram. Please, Miss Claire, I forgot it, ma'am, and he came, Mr. Stephen I mean, and I showed him the wire you wrote, and he said 'oh' and went away after he found where you was, and I was frightened by his look, and the way he says: 'Give this to Miss Claire when she comes back from her party!' So, I send it on, ma'am, by Briggs, this afternoon to be sure you get it."

Claire did not stop to read the abject apologies that brought Estelle's letter to a conclusion. She was tearing open the note from Stephen; somehow she could not control her hands. The paper seemed to dance before her eyes.

She read, in his stiff, characteristic writing:

"Claire dear—

"I am sorry you should have taken this way to indicate your lack of interest in my plans. Perhaps that is not fair to say, but just now I feel hardly myself. A great decision was facing me, and I wished that you might help me make it. Now I feel that your answer has been given, the choice must be mine alone. Had you felt otherwise I should have considered my duty done in answering the first call; now with this special opportunity facing me, and myself to decide it, I shall say 'Yes.'"

"You see, Claire, the Mission to Lepers have just issued an urgent appeal for a medical man for a Leper Colony in India. The last one has been one of themselves for some time—he was smitten some twelve months after he went with them. His condition is such he cannot handle the work longer. My own Board, hearing of the urgent need, have stood aside, that I might volunteer."

"Good-bye, Claire. I wish I might have seen you again, but perhaps it is better otherwise. May I add that you will always have the friendship, and best wishes and prayers of

"STEPHEN PATTERSON."

CLAIRE rose unsteadily, putting her hand on the table for support.

"I say—is it bad news?" Oris Holter was quite solicitous.

"Yes," replied Claire dully. "It's bad news. Will you help me find Daphne, please?"

Daphne was laughingly protesting to a group about the piano. A score of young people were uproariously applauding, demanding still another encore. The pianist swung in to the familiar air of "Good-night, Ladies."

"Say," drawled Daphne, "do you want to have my mother-in-law appearing to register protest? She's very strict on Sabbath observance, and it's past midnight."

"Sorry," laughed the pianist. "I'll fix that for you." He swung, still simulating dance time, into another familiar strain.

To Claire, standing mute and miserable, waiting for a word with her hostess, it seemed that the room with its laughing crowds was suddenly gone; as though she herself were back again at the farewell service to Stephen Paterson, that his eyes were on hers, that the words he sang were a prayer!

"God be with you till we meet again, Keep love's banner floating o'er you, Smite death's threatening wave before you: God be with you till we meet again."

THE vision passed as quickly as it had come. Some of the crowd about the piano were laughing.

"Don't—play—that! Stop them! Daphne—stop—them—playing—that!"

The music ended in a discord. Everyone was staring at the interrupter.

"Claire, dear! What's the matter? You're white as a sheet."

"Daphne, I'll have to go."

"Go?"

"To the city. At once!"

Daphne had taken the girl aside now, beyond the reach of curious ears.

"Claire, is it—Stephen?"

"How—how did you know?"

"I saw it in your eyes, dear. Is Stephen ill?"

"No—no. But I must see him—"

Daphne led Claire to a chair and forced her down into it; poured her a glass of water.

"It's after midnight. There's no train now. I'll run you up in the car in the morning, if you must go. There, I must skip, my guests are growing impatient."

Dimly into her consciousness floated the sounds of laughter, of someone still strumming on the piano. It all seemed so far removed from her now; too far removed to be even irritating. A clock on the mantelpiece struck the half hour. Six hours and half at least before she could act. Daphne would certainly not be ready before seven. Would she be in time?—in time to stop him?

SLEEP came at last, a sleep peopled with dream-figures to whom a fevered imagination lent a vesture of reality.

She was in a compound in India; on every hand poor leprous wretches lay in every stage of the disease. Finally a bell was ringing for service. And now it was the interior of some sort of building: as though possessing the power granted to old Scrooge she watched the service, herself disassociated from it. Stephen was speaking. The murmurings of the sufferers died away, hushed into silence. What a strange text for such a place, this one on which he spoke: "I am come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly!" Life!—life more abundant, in this place where death crept slowly, painfully, inevitably upon its work. But as she listened with them, it seemed as though a spirit of life radiated amongst them, as though the leprous marks were healed and the dim eyes lightened, until one old man from some far-off village, rising to his feet cried aloud: "O God, I am glad that I am a leper, or I had never known of Christ!"

A leper! At the word a sudden chant broke out: a hundred voices cried in her ears: "Unclean! Unclean!" A hundred pair of hands reached out to her, for now it seemed she was right amongst them, and she shrank away in terror, and they, looking upon her, turned away as those to whom hope is denied. Then it was that a figure whose grave and tender presence filled the simple meeting-house, came amongst them, and put out his hand and touched them, and turning looked upon her, so that she could not meet the glance, and clearly, distinctly came the words: "If any man would come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me," and somehow into the figure there came a more earthly semblance, and the eyes that looked at her so gravely, so tenderly, so lovingly were Stephen's . . .

She woke then, shivering with the coolness of the coming dawn. She threw some things about her, and sat at the window, watching the morning light break over the city, that lay dimly veiled, in the distance . . .

THE Superintendent of the Mission to Lepers was late for service in the city church he attended that Sunday morning. An importunate young person swathed in motoring impedimenta descended upon him about the time he was contemplating the choice of a flower for his buttonhole.

"A very extraordinary request," he told Rev. Mr. Wade in relating the matter after the service. "I told her, of course, that Stephen Patterson had been rushed off to New York to take a first boat. There was no chance at all of stopping him now. The thing had gone too far."

"She looked away a moment, then she said gently:

"You misunderstand me, I think. I don't want to stop him. I want to go with him."

"I told her, of course, it couldn't be done. We have no funds for it if the Board sanctioned another helper. She said: 'I have money. I've been saving up for a new runabout, and there's my allowance besides.' I asked how her parents would feel about it, hinting too that the allowance might cease. She looked me in the eyes, Wade, and said: 'Mr. Parker, everyone who has accomplished anything worth while in the world has had to have something of faith. Is it any less so in your work?' That sort of got me, Wade; I may be a bit of a fool, but I've wired Patterson and am going down with her this afternoon to see her folks and arrange things."

"What's that? Her motives? Ah, I asked her that. I said: 'Tell me, Miss Grantham, is it just on account of—Stephen—you are doing this? You must love him very much.'"

"She met the issue squarely: 'I did not know until last night how much, Mr. Parker. I never quite understood or appreciated him until last night. I seemed to catch his spirit—his spirit of sacrifice and service.' She was looking out the window of my study, Wade, as she said it, and it seemed to me that suddenly her face lighted up, as that of one who sees a vision. She added, forgetful, I am sure, of me: 'It came in a flash when He looked at me that way.'"

"She fell silent, and something bade me ask: 'Stephen?—Stephen looked at you?'"

"No," she said slowly. 'Stephen's Christ—through Stephen.'"

Why They Like the Christian Herald

A CHRISTIAN HERALD man has just returned from an interesting trip. A well-known doctor in a New York State town, speaking to him, said emphatically: "There are two things I can not do without, and from which I would not part for any price—my Bible and the Christian Herald. God's Word has indeed been a lamp to my feet, and the Christian Herald through all these years, by its editorials, its sermons and its articles, especially those with accompanying photographs illustrating Oriental scenery and customs, have all served to make that Bible clearer of meaning and therefore more helpful. And now the articles on the problems of our own country, discursive and constructive, the editorials, the descriptions of conditions and needs in other lands: the sweet, clean stories are all stimulating and satisfactory. Mrs. B. and I prize, especially now, the Home Church section. On Sunday nights I read to her the Meditations, all of them, and the wonderfully spiritual sermons of Dr. Jowett or some other good preacher, and you should hear us trying to sing the hymns that are selected to go with the service! But we have an hour of blessed fellowship with Him, whom the years with their experiences have taught us to know and love so well!"

Numerous were the testimonies of readers to the value of the paper to them. One little boy about ten, after reading Miss Sangster's poem on "The Boy and the Dog," said: "Mother, there is some one at the Christian Herald office who understands boys." That lad, his mother says, reads about everything in the magazine and looks eagerly for its coming each week. She has renewed her subscription, but in the name of that boy, and he feels that it is his paper now.

Just to Be Alive

What a Wonderful Gift from God It Is!

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

IT WAS early evening and everything was misty, and purple-gray, and still. Even the sea had a subdued note to it; the very waves seemed to be whispering softly to each other. And the stars—seen vaguely through the mist—were gentle and grave and smiling.

We don't get to the beach often. It was the end of a splendid holiday. And so we sat very quietly together, with a tender little breeze blowing through our hair, and our fingers just touching. And as we sat there it seemed, curiously, as if we were a part of the evening—of the whispering water, and the tinted mist, and the vivid star-shine, and the breeze. It seemed as if Nature were holding us close—as if the whole world were friendly toward us.

It was, somehow, almost profane to break the silence. It seemed as if words were out of place. And yet the whole scene was so beautiful that it was almost impossible not to speak.

"Isn't it marvelous," I murmured at last—in a tone that was ever so low, for I didn't want to disturb the waves, to interrupt the voice of the breeze, "Isn't it marvelous just to be alive, on a night like this?" And—"Yes," came the answer, "it is! Just to be alive on a night like this . . ."

SOMETIMES it's hard to find things to be glad about. We can't—unfortunately—all be Pollyanna people. Sometimes the way is pretty hard to travel, and things happen that don't seem fair, and the wrong person wins out and the right person is declared the loser. Sometimes it's difficult to follow the workings of an all-wise Providence—sometimes it's more than hard to bow meekly in the face of adversity. Sometimes even nature isn't appealing and beautiful. And yet there's always one thing to be glad about. It's a privilege, a challenge, and a trust just to be alive—just to be alive!

There was a little woman that I once knew—gone she is, now, to her Great Reward—who was so crippled by a particularly violent brand of rheumatism that she could not move from a chair, that she could not, in any way, use her fingers. Denied the joys of walking, of getting about, of doing even fancy work or plain knitting, she was forced to be content with sitting quietly in a chair and watching the wee section of the world—that lived on her street—pass by. And yet she was the jolliest, gayest, and apparently the happiest woman that it has almost ever been my privilege to know. She could even—though she suffered keenly for long periods of time—jest about her condition!

"I'm like the Lady of Shalott," she would say, laughingly, "the Lady of Shalott who never left her mirror. Like her I watch the shadows of the world appear. And such pretty shadows they are, too!" And then she would quote softly from Tennyson's poem:

"And, moving thro' a mirror clear
That hangs before her all the year,
Shadows of the world appear."

"Only," she would add in her cheery voice, "I'm more fortunate than the Lady of Shalott. For she had to be content with the mirror! She couldn't look down directly, as I can, upon the busy world. I never feel called to say, as she did, 'I am half sick of shadows!'"

I HAVE a friend—a well-meaning girl—who has a regrettable and unconscious habit of saying the wrong thing at the wrong time. Once I took her to call upon the little crippled woman. And while we were calling she made one of the unfortunate remarks which she cannot seem able to suppress.

"Often," she said, kindly, "I wonder how you can be so gay—just as if you are well, like we are. You have so little to live for and yet you're so contented!"

I listened aghast—there was no way of stopping her, and she had not meant to emphasize an unpleasant subject. But I need not have worried, for the little woman's optimism rose, triumphant, above even acute tactlessness.

"But, my dear," she protested, "how could I be anything but gay? How could I be discontented with the lot that has been given me? Just being alive—just having friends and acquaintances, just having lips to speak with and ears to hear with and eyes to see with is enough; more than enough! I don't miss the hands and feet very much. Just being alive is enough!"

JUST being alive is enough. Even when being alive isn't as glorious as it was that night when we sat on the beach—lost in the sheer beauty of God's universe—and listened to the breeze and the murmuring waves. Just being alive, just having the privilege of existing in this world, is payment for many a discomfort, and trouble, and sorrow. Just feeling the throb of red blood running through our veins, just being conscious of the emotions and even the fears of life is worth while.

We can't—unfortunately—all be Pollyanna people. We can't all—though we have more reason to be happy, most of us, than she had—be like my little crippled friend. But we can, when we're inclined to feel out of sorts and baffled and weary, thank the Lord for one thing—for the greatest gift of all. We can thank Him for giving life to us—sheer, vital glowing existence. We can thank Him for making us one with the beautiful things that He, in His vast power, has created! We can thank Him for allowing us to be a part of an age of almost stupendous happenings—we can thank Him for that!

LOOK around you and see the things that you're most glad about. Perhaps—if you're city bred—they're the dignity of marble columns or the width of great Avenues, or the shops, with their Arabian Nights allure, or the stately quiet and peace of great churches. Perhaps, if you live in the West, it's the sweep of the prairies that gives you the most intense satisfaction and happiness. Perhaps the wind in the golden wheat and the far blue horizon line are the joys that make you really glad to be alive. Perhaps, if you live in a small town or on a farm, it's the simple scenes, the kindly friends, that give you the most pleasure—perhaps it's the ruddy sputter of a fire upon a hearth or the moist lips of a little child upon your cheek. Perhaps it's the clasp of a loved one's fingers settling down over your hand that makes you smile and say, in the center of your soul: "It's good to be alive!"

But maybe—though you live in a city—your lot is a crowded room and a narrow dingy street. Maybe, though you live in the vital West, your existence is such a struggle that you've little time or opportunity ever to see the beauties of nature. Maybe you live quite alone with few friends and few neighbors, and loneliness as your hearthstone guest. Maybe, for you, there is no child to fondle or to dream about—maybe there is no loved one to touch you with warm hands. Maybe your life seems in a rut that will never change!

And yet—despite ruts and loneliness and hard work—you've the same reason to be glad that the more happily situated folk have. For you're alive—you're a breathing, growing, vital part of the world. You're alive!

Even though you're in some dark tenement room, or a lonely farmhouse, or a small unambitious town, or a overcrowded, heedless city, you can thank Him. Being alive is everybody's miracle.

With the workmen of India receiving wages so low that hunger always is their portion, even the sturdiest of Indian boys is old at an age when he should be barely entering his prime, and never can develop into the willing and efficient worker America knows

New Enterprise in an Ancient Land

INDIA is on the threshold of a great industrial awakening. Many Indians, however, object to the use of the word "awakening," and claim that India always has been awake industrially. To prove this they point to the industries that have been carried on for centuries in the artisan homes of the villages, often with the help of the entire family, as family trades are carried on in Switzerland today.

If we admit this contention we must change the phrase and say: India is now on the verge of an industrial Westernization. And this is exactly what not a few Indian economists fear, because of its attendant unions, strikes, closed shops, etc.

At the present time fully 96 per cent. of the population of India is dependent on agriculture and certain industries closely allied to it. Out of a population of nearly 350 millions only about two millions are employed regularly in factories, mills and workshops. The tendency, however, is toward the conversion of India from an almost wholly agricultural to a largely manufacturing country.

The air is full of new schemes and the country of new enterprises, which are being rapidly developed. Even during the four years of the war some 700 new companies were registered, with a combined capital of about $200,000,000. Public opinion is veering around from its former indifference, or satisfaction with things as they have been, to a discontent that is gradually insisting upon the India of the future being self-supporting, and its trade, commerce, and industries being no longer helplessly dependent on external supplies.

THE cotton industry is stretching out to an hitherto unbelievable extent. In 1919 India exported raw cotton to a value of about $138,000,000 and manufactured cotton to about $43,000,000 and made its highest record of combined cotton exportation. Cotton production has risen nearly 50 per cent. above the pre-war production, while imports from overseas have fallen by about 40 per cent. The industry now employs nearly 350,000 laborers.

The "Swadeshi" movement is actively engaged in increasing the sale of Indian-made products in India, especially cotton fabrics. I went down into the bazaars of Delhi not long ago and tried to get a certain quality of white duck. Before I found just what wanted I had visited ten or twelve shops, and in every one of them, whether owned by Hindus or Mohammedans, I was first shown Indian-made material and had to insist before English goods were brought out for my inspection. The present trouble with the finer grades of Indian cotton fabrics is that the finish is not up to that of the English material; its wearing quality is about the same, but the secret of fine finish has not yet been attained. When this is found, as without doubt it will be, the local product may be expected to dominate the market.

A recent report of the United States Department of Commerce says, "India's most valuable possession, both from a military and a commercial point of view, is its constant supply of raw hides and skins." Until very recently practically all Indian hides were exported to be tanned abroad, it being thought that proper tanning materials could not be found in India. The War brought this condition home very forcibly and the British Government set experts to work. The result has been that barks well fitted for tanning have been found in India, and from now on fewer Indian hides will be sent abroad and more will be prepared at home. This opens up an immense new field in leather.

The iron and steel industry is assuming large proportions, and a product of excellent quality is available. The plant of the Indian Iron and Steel Company covers six and one-half square miles, while the rolling mills of the Tata Iron and Steel Company have a capacity of over 100,000 tons of steel plates per annum.

The cultivation and production of tea employs more coolie labor than any other one industry, 700,000 laborers being engaged in this work.

India practically monopolizes the jute trade, and in the great mills of Bengal there are upward of 300,000 laborers.

AND yet can India successfully take on these new industries and the rejuvenated old ones, and carry them to the point where they will be made to pay, in competition with similar industries in the West?

Under existing conditions there is one thing that militates strongly against such a result, and that is the inefficiency of the Indian workman, as judged by maximum output. Under existing conditions India can not successfully compete. Under conditions as they should exist it could. To see why the Indian workman is inefficient it is necessary to look at some present industrial conditions.

There are four things that most affect the output of the workman—hours of work, housing conditions, factory sanitation, and wages.

Let us take wages first. The average Indian laborer, working in factories and mills in Bombay, Calcutta and other large cities, receives so low a wage that he is forced to keep himself in debt to the "bania," or money-lender, in order that he and his family may live. The Indian lives cheaply and his standard is low, but even so the average laborer can not maintain his family and keep out of debt. Also, his standard can never rise while his wage scale stays where it now is.

Borrowing money from the "bania" is like entering on a geometrical progression of debt. The rate of interest is usurious and the "bania" is absolutely without scruple or compassion. An amount of any size once borrowed, the debt is seldom cleared off. On each pay day the patient Indian takes his pay to the "bania," and the latter gives him back a small amount in cash and credits his account with the balance. From this credit he is then given enough rice or wheat for his family to subsist on until next pay day, while the "bania" not only charges interest on the original loan but on the value of the food given, as well. Is there any incentive for a man to do an honest day's work when he knows that all he makes will have to go to the "bania"; that he will never get out of debt; and that more than likely his son will have to saddle the same debt for the most, if not all, of his life?

If, as is sometimes claimed, the Indian workman is paid low wages because of his inefficiency, can it not also be said that his inefficiency springs from the constant state of malnutrition for which his low wages are responsible? For the "bania" never gives enough food to keep the family as it should be kept, and what is given is of the poorest quality. It is no exaggeration to say that the average Indian laborer is always underfed, and often does not know what it is not to be hungry.

THEN the hours of work. Until a factory investigation in 1908 found that many factories were compelling their men to work from fourteen to eighteen hours a day, the number of hours that the Indian workman had to put in depended entirely on the tender-heartedness of his employer. After the investigation, the government changed the Factories Act so as to make it a violation for any textile factory to employ a person more than twelve hours a day, and also inserted a clause to the effect that each person so employed must be granted a recess of not less than one-half hour during this twelve-hour day. This was called alleviation.

The Indian workman, therefore, is at his work for a possible twelve hours a day and seven days a week, for only rarely does he get a holiday and there is no weekly recurring Sunday, with only one break of one-half hour in each day, when he eats his mid-day food—unappetizing and scant as it is sure to be.

Hours such as these do not make efficient workmen.

The proper housing of workmen is being considered more and more important in the West. How are the Indian workmen housed? In Bombay there are nearly 800,000 workmen who live in quarters consisting of one room about 8 x 10 feet. The whole family owns this one room as its place of abode and sleeps in it during the rains or cold weather. At other times, and fortunately these constitute the greater part of the year, the family sleeps on the ground or iron stairways outside. All the cooking is done in this hovel. Surrounding conditions are indescribable, and it is not to be wondered at that the death rate in such places is something like fifty-five per thousand.

And the fourth: factory sanitation or the conditions under which the laborers work. With a few exceptions these are about as bad as they could well be. The majority of the factories are neither properly ventilated nor sufficiently lighted. The Indian workman has to contend not only against the other handicaps, but against improper sanitation in the factory as well. The investigation referred to above stated that the ventilation in some of the factories was so bad that for a man simply to sit in them for a few hours, without doing any work, was exhausting. Working close to each other, in a climate that causes profuse perspiration, and with a people who are fearfully prone to tuberculosis—if factory sanitation is anywhere needed, it is here.

TAKING these conditions of long hours, low wages, bad housing, and improper sanitation into consideration, is it to be wondered at that the standard of efficiency of the Indian workman is low? Do not these conditions largely explain the reason for the very general complaint against him that he is forever loafing. The Indian rarely does a full day's work in any one day; how can he? Also, such conditions pave the way to premature inability for any strenuous work.

Yet this same workman is not without initiative and ambition, as witness the fact that recently, and contrary to all expectation, he has shown an ability to organize. In Bombay, recently, some 70,000 laborers went on strike for several days, without any union organization being in existence. Since that time there have been other small strikes both in mills and factories and on the railways. Almost all of these occurred where there were no regular organizations among the men. In Calcutta there was a strike of postal employees. With the exception of four or five recently formed unions in Madras, the laborer in India is unorganized.

There is no doubt that the Indian laborer is exploited by capital. This does not mean European capital only; the Indian capitalist is quite as bad, and as a rule has less regard for the laborer than the European has. Government does so little to alleviate the condition of labor that what is done only serves to throw into bold relief the crying need for proper and full legislation.

IF INDIAN industries are to be Westernized, the work will have to be done by Westerners, for there are few Indians of large business ideas or organizing capacity. If the Westerner plans to do it, it will pay him well to first try the experiment of bettering the conditions under which his workmen are to live and labor. It is true that generations of improper and insufficient nourishment have made the Indian coolie constitutionally weak; it may be that the desired results would not be had in this generation; but it would undoubtedly show and pay in the next. The American, however, is seldom willing to do anything for the results of which he has to wait a generation.

The case of the coolie on the great tea estates is somewhat different from that of his fellow in the cities. Because of his outdoor life and the fact that he is often largely paid "in kind," so that his food supply does not suffer by the rises in the price of food-stuffs,

An Indian girl student of chemistry, who despite age-long restrictions on woman's activities may be of service in improving the industries of her land his working conditions are a little better. Yet his housing is as bad and the treatment meted out to him by his superiors is generally worse. Manhandling is a frequent occurrence on these estates, where the European in charge is often the only authority for miles around, and where the coolies are little better than slaves.

It is only fair to say, however, that the condition of the laborer as we have been discussing it here is true only in the large cities. As a rule his condition is better in the "mofussil" or districts away from the larger cities. In some of the outlying towns the laborer has better pay and shorter hours and works under better conditions than he would be able to find in the large centers. But the number of workmen employed in the "mofussil" is comparatively small.

THERE is much present lack of understanding between the Indian and the Englishman. This is the cause of a large amount of the business friction and lack of confidence that exists between them. Such a state of affairs is due principally to the absence of the close personal contact that existed between them in the early days. Then the Englishman went out to India with the expectation of making it his home for as long as he was in active life (and frequently he remained there after he had retired from business) and of getting back to England only at long intervals. Consequently he set out to know the people of the country and to make close friends of the better ones among them. In most cases this led to understandings that were both pleasant and helpful.

Today, however, the average Englishman who goes out to India does not expect to stay there for any great length of time; he has come out on a three-year contract; he has little or no use for the Indian; and he is continually looking forward to the time when he can go home again. Naturally the relations between him and the Indian are none too happy.

What will be the result of an industrial Westernization of India? If it comes it will come not because India desires it but because it is thrust upon her. The spirit of India is communistic and therefore against concentrated industrialism. One Indian writer recently said that the Indian system of industry had always demanded that "artisans should work on their own account, and not at the bidding of masters or employers or machines." If an intensified industrialism is forced upon India, and it can be done, without the condition of the laborer being cared for, it is not at all unlikely that social revolution will be the result. It is no answer to point out the condition of the village artisan and say that when he is moved to the city he is not much worse off. Men will bear hardships patiently when they are working alone and are "on their own," which they will not put up with in the mass.

The communistic ideas and desires of India will be overruled, Western industrialism will be forced upon her, but unless it is done gently, unless it is accompanied by thought for the welfare of the laborer, the result will be disastrous.

Sixty-Three Years in One Pastorate

SIXTY-THREE years as the pastor of one congregation and still in active service—that is the record of Rev. W. N. Norment, the minister of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church at Whiteville, Tenn., who is perhaps the oldest pastor in the world in point of service. He is nearing the century mark, and while of course his steps are becoming feeble and his eyes somewhat dim he is still able to care for himself and to think for himself and gets about in as active a manner as do many men of sixty. He may be spared to preach for several years yet. Only a year ago he was a commissioner to the Cumberland General Assembly at McKenzie, Tenn., and delivered a stirring address to that body.

Rev. Norment was educated at Cumberland University, Lebanon, Tenn., and few of the comrades of his college days survive. The members of the board of elders who called him to the Whiteville church long ago passed into the Great Beyond, but their children and their children's children have continued to renew the call. When he took charge of the congregation the district was scantily settled, with only a house here and there, the howl of the wolf was almost as common as is the bark of the dog today, and wild sheep fed in reasonable safety where herds of sheep now graze. Men whom he baptized as infants now are bent in years, and he has performed the marriage ceremony for the children and grandchildren of couples whom he married in youth.

As a young man Rev. Norment was a caller at the home of Andrew Jackson near Nashville, and he still can give a most interesting picture of the personal appearance and home life of the one-time president and hero of New Orleans. He recalls with pleasure the words of General Jackson, then a devoted Christian, to him: "Yours is a great calling, young man; yes, a great calling, indeed."

A few days ago William Jennings Bryan came to Whiteville and, after meeting Rev. Norment, said of him in his address: "I have talked with Brother Norment and find him to be the most remarkable old man I have ever met. Why, the scenes of three-score-and-ten years ago are told by him today with just as fresh a memory as had they occurred but yesterday."

Rev. Norment would not exchange his record for that of any king, and he explains the devotion of his people in these simple words: "The reason that I have been able to hold my same work through these many years is because I have tried to preach Christ to the people."

A Minister's Wife Story You'll Chuckle Over

By PRUDENCE TASKER OLSEN

Illustrated by William C. McNulty

IT WAS a hot summer afternoon. The green and white of the lawn and house, the shade of the trees and deep porch, looked cool and inviting.

"Don't get up for a chair for me, Aunt Lucy," I said. "I'd rather sit here on the top step. Then I can see both you and the flowers."

Aunt Lucy, little and plump and white-aproned, sat in her rocker above me, making "Ladies' Aid button-holes." To the uninitiated there was a stern set to her features, but we who knew her saw only the twinkle in her eyes. She looked over her spectacles at me.

"Suit yourself. I'm not one to deny the pleasure if a porch step'll make you happy. 'Melia scrubbed here this morning. And I've got some more flowers in the house to show you before you go."

"Oh, Aunt Lucy, don't hurry me away like this," I said. For the old lady dearly loved friendly banter.

"Humph! I guess there's no danger of hurrying you while you can look right through the hall and dining-room and see 'Melia in the kitchen making lemonade."

"Oh, I do see her, and I can hear her cracking ice for it. I am glued to this step for the next hour. I wish I could make buttonholes like you. I followed your directions and tried and tried on the preacher-erman's pajamas. But those buttonholes look like—like—"

"Pig's eyes, like-ly," said Aunt Lucy calmly, holding her needle high to thread.

"I never really noticed a pig's eye, but it sounds most bad enough. Someone told me once, by way of cheering me up, that a preacher's wife was always a poor house-keeper. Maybe it's in the blood, too, to make poor buttonholes."

AUNT LUCY carefully cut a new hole. "One of the best buttonhole-makers and house-keepers I ever knew was a preacher's wife. Did you ever hear of Mrs. Leslie, Mrs. John Wesley Leslie? If you'd ever come within ten miles of any town where they ever lived and the wind was blowing your way, you'd of heard. She was the best-loved preacher's wife I think I ever knew."

"Oh, Aunt Lucy, do tell me about her. She shall be my model!" I cried, half in fun, half in earnest. I was the very young bride of a very young preacher. I wanted to be liked, to be loved, and I was so very ignorant of all that a preacher's wife should be and do.

"Just sit back and keep calm. The lemonade is 'most here," said Aunt Lucy. "You go to taking some other woman as your model and you'll just spoil yourself. The Lord doesn't want any two preacher-wives alike any more than He does two trees, or two leaves. And more than that, I shouldn't want you exactly like Mrs. Leslie myself. Sometimes—I remember—some things—"

Aunt Lucy was holding her glass untouched, while a dream of the olden days came into her mind and eyes.

"Tell me about her, anyway," I begged.

"Well," my hostess took an appreciative taste of her lemonade. "If you won't interrupt me, I'll tell you about her eagles—"

"Eagles!" I cried. "Why, Aunt Lucy! I've heard of preacher-folks having chickens and canaries and even parrots. But eagles!"

"There, you've interrupted already. Do you want I should tell you about it?"

Reprieved I subsided with mock meekness.

"Yes, eagles, five of them, gold ones."

"Oh, not money! Not fifty dollars all at once—and a preacher's wife!"

THE look I received was of one who has suffered long and despaired. She set her glass on the porch railing and took up her buttonholes.

"Oh, I'll be good and not say another word. It was only that I was so surprised and—and—thrilled."

"If you can keep still," said Aunt Lucy sternly—and how I loved that twinkle in her eye! Dear Aunt Lucy! For more than ten years she has been living in her heavenly mansion. And I doubt not she has been helping the sewing circle up there cut and make the angels' robes. I know she has not been idle all these years, nor do I think she would want to sing in the choir. I am sure that through long sunny hours she and her dearest friend, who went home even before Aunt Lucy did, sit on the wide front porch where they can hear the music, and finish up the garments that have been started in the "circle."

"My sister-in-law came to visit me that summer.

I was pretty proud of her, for she was rich and good-looking—and she was good. I showed her off quite a lot. And I was proud of the Leslies, especially Mrs. Leslie, so I showed them off to her, too.

"So it jarred me some that last afternoon Janie was with me to have her ask,

"Is that Mrs. Leslie's only outfit?"

"I guess maybe I looked kind of surprised, for she said:

"Oh you know I don't think clothes are every-thing. But most women like more than one shabby forty dollars. There's lots of folks I find just teetering on the edge of generosity and all it needs is for some one to give them a good push. Everyone we asked was willing to give, though I must say that the amounts given didn't vary according to the means of them giving.

"And surprised! She was the most surprised woman you ever saw. She could hardly find words to thank us, and she's a good talker ordinarily, too. Of course we couldn't come right out and say to her, 'Now do go buy you some clothes—you need 'em!' But we hinted plain enough, dear knows. Mrs. Wells, the Aid president, presented the five gold eagles all done up in a jeweller's box, and she made a real neat speech we all thought, about how Mrs. Leslie had always done for others and we wanted to show our appreciation and do for her a little and how it was for her own personal pocketbook, and so on. And we all discussed the sale at Bean's and whether navy blue or black would be prettiest for a silk dress. And Mrs. Leslie just beamed and wiped her eyes and said it was an answer to prayer, that she had been longing for a little money she could spend as she wanted.

Then we felt meaner than ever, to think she had been realizing how shabby she was.

"Well, next Sunday we all craned our necks and waited and watched, and lo and behold! if she didn't come walking calmly down the aisle in that same old black suit and homely four-year-old hat.

"Well," I says to myself, 'she's probably making things and hasn't had time to finish and wants every-thing new at once.'

THAT afternoon Mrs. Neil called me up on the 'phone. Mrs. Neil was treasurer of our Missionary Society.

"What do you think?" she says. "Mrs. Leslie gave me an envelope this morning with an offering in it to apply on that scholarship in Chiney we thought we'd have to give up. And when I opened it, what do you think? There was one of them gold pieces!"

"I admit I was just plain flabbergasted. But it was so like her. And Mrs. Neil says:

"And what do you think? Mrs. Jeffrie was in here. You know what she thinks of foreign missions and all the remarks she's made about 'em and about us who are ijits enough to give to 'em. But she does like Mrs. Leslie. And what do you think? (Mrs. Neil always asked that every other breath.) She says: 'You spirit that back to Mrs. Leslie. I'll give them ten dollars to your old scholarship.'"

"I've always heard the Lord didn't bless giving of that kind, but I tell you I blessed it right then and there.

"But that isn't the end. It's just the beginning. Next morning I was down-town and going by Bangor's Men's Furnishing Store. I see Mr. Bangor and he motioned me in.

"Mrs. Johns," he says, 'look at this!'

"He opens his cash drawer and takes out a gold eagle.

"My wife told me about you women giving Mrs. Leslie five gold pieces to buy herself some things, so I was some surprised when she came in Sat'day night and bought two shirts and some collars for her husband and paid for 'em with this. Course I couldn't refuse it, but I felt pesky mean. And Sunday I went to church. You know I ain't much of a church-goer. That was an awful good sermon Mr. Leslie preached. He looks neat, 'specially far off, but I could see he did need clothes, bad. And she—land, I'd call her most shabby. The more I thought of her sneaking those things into her absent-minded husband's bureau drawer and going without things herself, the more I couldn't stand it. I ain't give much toward church work lately, so you just take this gold piece and somehow get it back to that little woman."

"No, don't get in a hurry. That isn't the end, either.

THAT very afternoon I met Mrs. Coaly on the street. She was a poor soul with three children to support; took in washing. She come up to me with tears in her eyes and she says:

"Oh, Mrs. Johns, what a wonderful woman Mrs. Leslie is! She's an angel! I was sick all last week and so was short on the rent, and Mr. Jaynes, who owns black suit and two white blouses, and a hat that looks home-made and made-over."

"Maybe I blushed. I hope so.

"Well, of course," I said, "We don't pay a very big salary—there was talk last year of a raise—but things have gone up and folks don't feel they can give more than they have been doing. The Leslies seem to get along pretty well. They have two girls away at school."

THAT was a bluff and I knew it. It sounds like a luxury to send your children away to school. I knew how they were sacrificing to do it, and how the girls were sacrificing and working to be able to go.

"Next Thursday we kind of planned to do something for her, it being her birthday. It's Aid meeting anyway," I said. I didn't tell her that what we had planned to do was to go there for our meeting and take our lunch—and eat it. Think of that for a generous present!

"Well, Janie fished around in her crochet bag and brought out a ten-dollar gold piece.

"Here, take this," she says, 'and get her four more like it. Have her spend 'em on herself. I only wish I could stay for your Aid meeting.'

"Well, we had no trouble at all raising the other

An Open Letter to Lloyd George

DEAR SIR:
You are the Premier of Great Britain and we understand that you are coming over to the United States as Great Britain's representative, to attend the great disarmament conference called by President Harding to confer, with other representatives of other countries, on the mighty question of reducing military expenses and ultimately laying down warlike arms to such an extent that the world may be free from the awful burden of war upkeep, and in doing away with offensive weapons and military programs, put an end to the possibility of any two nations fighting, when they have nothing with which to fight.

You are a man of high ideals, a descendant of preachers and church members. It is true, of course, that your political enemies call you an opportunist and an expert straddler in politics, and they say that on that account you have been able to maintain your place of leadership, while all the other national leaders of the great powers have been defeated or set aside or found wanting. But all that has nothing to do with the main thing just now, which is the fact that we believe you are honestly in favor of disarmament and of world-wide peace, making war forever impossible. It is because we firmly believe you hold to this one great principle, no matter what your political enemies call you, that we venture to address this open letter to you.

Are you coming to this disarmament conference with the one great purpose in your heart which the common people of your country and of ours hold? You surely know what that purpose is. We are not authorized to tell you what your duty is, but we are competent to tell you that the overwhelming number of the citizens of the United States want war to cease, so that the arts and sciences and education and industry and religion may have a chance to grow out of a soil that has not been sown with bayonets and battle-ships and gas and bombs and guns. We are authorized to say to you that if Great Britain comes over here to this conference with an honest desire to end war, your country will find the people of our country of one heart and mind.

We are not speaking of the military men or the diplomats, but of the people. We are sick of wars, past, present and possible future. We want armament limited and we want it now. Why should the nations wait? They have been waiting ever since Cain killed Abel.

We believe that you are stronger than the politicians and militarists of Great Britain, and at the conference will act as your own conscience and convictions direct you. We do not believe that you will come to the conference as a diplomat, but as a Christian statesman. You will not insist that Great Britain be superior to every other nation on the seas. You will not plead the necessity of large standing armies in India or Egypt on account of your situation there. You will not obstruct the real purpose of the conference, which is to discuss not national rights and privileges, but the rights and privileges of mankind, which are above all selfish national claims.

Therefore we anticipate your coming as Great Britain's representative to take a part in this most important gathering. And as a believer in the Prince of Peace, as you are, by your own membership in one of the Master's communions, we pray with you that the result of the conference may be DISARMAMENT and the glory of the Lord revealed in Peace to the world, and good-will towards men. Respectfully, THE AMERICAN PEOPLE.

Reforming the Hymnal

EVERY decade or so, we hear of some movement looking to reforming the hymnology of the churches. Nobody knows just how or where it begins, and its results usually amount to little or nothing. It has been discovered long ago that, as spiritual experience is infinite in variety, and as the individual temperament chooses its own form of expression, so there has been and probably always will be in the hymnology of the churches a range wide enough, if not to suit all tastes, at least to reasonably satisfy the majority.

We recall how, in the early stages of the world-war, we heard in almost all the religious gatherings the triumphant hymns of the church sung with a fervor and enthusiasm that showed popular appreciation. Now that peace and international good-will are in the ascendant, it is proposed that the old hymns of the church militant should be suppressed or modified; that they must be soft-pedalled or omitted. To effect the reform which the projectors of the plan have in view, they would undertake a systematic tinkering and recasting of many hymns, including especially those with the aggressive or triumphant note. These advocates of an upholstered hymn-book, with all the aggressiveness taken out of it, overlook the fact that the Christian life is a battle against sin from start to finish. Today, as in the times of the prophets, the apostles, and all down through the centuries, the victory in the battle is to the strong soul, the fearless heart, the hand that wields the sword of the Spirit.

We wish some of those well-meaning hymn reformers might read a timely and instructive article on the "Relation of our Hymns to the Bible," by Rev. Louis F. Benson, in the current number of "The Biblical Review." Hymn-books were rare before the Reformation. That era virtually saw the introduction of congregational singing, and there was no lack of aggressive or triumphant note.

While many popular productions of the modern hymn writers may be open to criticism as to literary or musical expression, it should not be forgotten that some of the simplest hymns have been remarkable aids in driving the Gospel message home to human hearts.

Dr. Isaac Watts, the first open advocate of evangelical hymns, held that in the choice of themes the Gospel should always predominate. He claimed absolute freedom to compose spiritual songs that were suited to all classes of worshippers, adapted to all occasions of Christian praise, and expressive of various phases of Christian experience. In other words, he claimed that the Gospel hymns of the Church should have a range as wide as its sermons and its prayers.

If the hymn-book is to be revised, let it be done by retaining all the really great Christian hymns and by dropping out those that have fallen into disuse. Never should it be forgotten that the great revival hymns, which have won multitudes of souls in the past, should be preserved. The world needs a revival, our own land as much as any. And the day will come when the Hymns of Refreshing and Christian triumph will be a more valued part of church music than they have been of late years.

Peace and Diplomacy

IT MIGHT better be worded Diplomacy and Peace. Because every time in the history of nations when world-wide peace has been under even casual discussion, the intrigue and diplomacy of what are known as "The Powers" of Europe have been barriers in the way of any practical advance along the line of a real disarmament.

Suppose, at the coming Conference on Disarmament Great Britain, France, Italy, Japan, China and the United States, and any other nations that may share in that meeting, come to Washington for a real conference to discuss in real honest fashion the main thing, which is to step towards the putting to an end of war and the establishment of permanent peace around the world. In that case diplomacy will take a second place to peace.

But suppose each one of the countries making up the personnel of the Conference comes to Washington secretly determined to secure for its own country's advantage some point along the line of the old-world diplomacy, then peace will be overshadowed by the miserable intrigue and scheming which made the meetings of the old Hague Conferences such a farce, so far as any real advance towards peace is concerned. For it will be remembered that at several of the Hague meetings the delegates gravely discussed the right or wrong use of dum-dum bullets in war! That was about as far as The Hague Conference.

Up to the present moment in spite of all the terrible lessons the war is supposed to have taught mankind, diplomacy has played a mighty part in the debates and discussions even around the table of the League of Nations, and in all the international politics of Europe. In spite of all appeals for the Armenians and in spite of all Christian ethics, the Turk is still allowed to practise his atrocities, and the nations are at this moment watching one another selfishly to see that no advantage is taken in the matter of partition of territory or the increase of armament.

The coming Conference at Washington ought to be a real DISARMAMENT conference. Disarmament is what the world needs, and it is what the common people want. If the coming conference takes time to discuss policies that belong to the field of diplomacy and the selfish rights of the individual nations, it will be in vain. The common people are tired of diplomacy. They want an end of war. The diplomatist will say that the matter is very complicated, and that embarrassing conditions exist which make disarmament almost impossible. But the average citizen who never had any training in the diplomacy which has kept the bloody Turk on the throne for centuries cannot see why the nations cannot all agree to stop making battleships, and also agree to reduce together their war material and their military programs.

And they will do it if the main thing is kept in view and diplomacy told to take a back seat, or, better still, not allowed to come in to the conference at all.

Let every one who loves his country and wants to live to see disarmament a practical reality, offer a mighty prayer that at the coming momentous Conference for disarmament, Peace will sit at the head of the table, and Diplomacy be told to wait outside the door; and when the representatives come out after reaching a real disarmament agreement, they can tell Diplomacy to go forever to its own place, wherever that is.

Railroad Values

THE Interstate Commerce Commission proceeding under the valuation act of 1913 is completing and announcing its appraisal of the physical properties of a number of the less important railroads. Its findings make interesting reading to the general public, which as a rule does not get copies of the Commission's investigations.

For example, showing how some of these roads are over-capitalized, the New Orleans, Texas and Mexico Railroad claims to have invested in road and equipment $35,171,019. But the Commission reports that this property can be reproduced new for $8,594,019, with the necessary depreciation allowance. The actual value of the road is therefore less than one-third of the claimed value.

The Chesapeake Beach Railway, running into Washington, claims on the books of the carriers, an investment in road and equipment of $2,567,231. But the Commission believes it could be reproduced new for $724,510.

The Central of Arkansas Railroad claims an investment of $260,000, while the Commission says that it could be reproduced new for $3,172. This small road has practically disintegrated, yet it is included in the $19,800,000,000 valuation placed upon American railroads as a basis for rate-making.

Is any comment necessary on the above, except to say that until true valuations are placed upon the railroads, the public may expect to pay exorbitant rates for freight and general passenger traffic. If dividends must be made for stockholders on such a basis of fictitious values, no one but the traveling and business public can pay for them. The railroad business will not be established on a right basis until the real values are made to correspond with the figures on the carriers' books.

THE badge of youth admits young people at every door. They will crowd in where you consider the social life you propose to offer. They will blister you with scorn if your action is only negative, if you pride yourselves only on what you forbid. They can go into near-by villages and buy themselves the victuals of social life. You can send them away, or can give them to eat. You can lay your emphasis upon what you forbid, and the youth of the world will pass the church by.

To the thousands of churches who are facing the problem of keeping youth in the church these words from the Episcopal Address of the Board of Bishops to the last General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church should be of more than passing interest.

The World News of the Week

Formal Invitations Issued for Disarmament Conference, November 11

FORMAL invitations have been sent by Secretary Hughes, on behalf of President Harding, to Great Britain, France, Italy and Japan to participate in a conference on disarmament and Pacific and Far Eastern questions to open in Washington on Armistice Day, November 11. At the same time, China was invited to take part in the Pacific and Far Eastern discussion. Since all the nations named have approved the conference proposal, it was expected that formal acceptances would be received at once and rapid progress made in arranging for the meeting.

Secretary Hughes's note specifically declared that it was not the purpose of this government to attempt to define the scope of the discussion in relation to the Pacific and Far East—a point regarding which Japan has manifested great anxiety—"but rather to leave this to be the subject of suggestions to be exchanged before the meeting of the conference, in the expectation that the spirit of friendship and a cordial appreciation of the importance of the elimination of sources of controversy will govern the final decision."

In outlining the reasons which render imperative such a conference, Secretary Hughes stressed the fact that the present armaments constitute an economic burden too great to be borne, and that they are a constant menace to the peace of the world rather than an assurance of its preservation. He placed the question of limiting naval armaments first, but prepared the way for a discussion of the reduction of land forces, and suggested that it might be advisable to formulate proposals for the suitable control of new agencies of warfare.

It was announced at the White House that Secretary Hughes would head the American delegation.

Senate Passes Anti-Beer Bill

THE supplementary prohibition enforcement bill, banning the use of beer as medicine and limiting the quantity of other alcoholic liquors which a physician may prescribe, has been passed by the Senate by a vote of 39 to 20 and sent to conference with the House. Several important changes were made in the measure, and it was feared there might be a prolonged deadlock between the two bodies.

One Senate amendment would make it a misdemeanor for any official or agent of the United States to search the property or premises of any person without previously having obtained a search warrant and would make it a felony for any person not an authorized government official, agent or employee to cause, "under color of claim to be acting as such," any person to be deprived of any of the rights or immunities guaranteed by the Constitution. Just what this latter provision was designed to accomplish remained in question, but that it might be used to embarrass organizations such as the Anti-Saloon League which seek to assist in the enforcement of the law was obvious.

Other amendments adopted would permit the reimportation of large quantities of American liquors now held in foreign countries, provided they are returned in the original packages and stored in bonded warehouses; and would authorize the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to compel changes in the formula of any patent medicine used largely as a beverage.

Silesian Dispute Referred to League

PREMIERS LLOYD GEORGE and Briand, unable to agree on a division of Upper Silesia between Germany and Poland, have dodged the entire issue, for a time at least, by having the Allied Supreme Council refer the question to the League of Nations. They decided on this course, which means an indefinite delay in effecting a settlement, after they had spent several days in Paris trying to reach a compromise. Early in the Council's session it appeared that a compromise had been agreed on and that only the details of the boundary line remained to be worked out, but with each of the five experts urging a different line it was finally decided to defer attempts at a settlement.

One of the big factors in the failure of their efforts was a petition calling for the immediate reassembling of the French Parliament which was circulated by Republican leaders in the Chamber of Deputies who thought Briand was conceding too much to Lloyd George. They had obtained 200 of the 250 signatures necessary, and it was manifest that if Briand yielded his ministry would be overthrown speedily, so he was compelled to stand firm. Meanwhile an important message from Eamonn de Valera regarding the Irish peace negotiations had been received in London, and the plea that Lloyd George was needed imperatively at home gave the occasion for cutting short the Council meeting, with every appearance of good-will on each side. The Silesian problem then was referred to the League and Lloyd George left Paris, with the crisis between Britain and France regarded as solved, the action having been taken under the covenant and treaty provisions for referring to the League any circumstances which threaten to disturb international peace or good understanding.

On the Greco-Turkish war, the Allies adopted resolutions declaring their strict neutrality and their belief that the time was not ripe for mediation and giving their nationals the right to sell arms to either belligerent. The effect of this is to destroy the Treaty of Sevres.

The steamship Athlon crashed on to the rocks at Port Ludlow, Puget Sound, Washington, but all of her passengers were rescued. For the vessel no means of salvage has been devised, and she has been given up as a total loss.

Big Cut Made in Tax Bill

FEDERAL expenditures for the next fiscal year are to be held down to $4,034,000,000, it was decided at a White House conference participated in by President Harding, Secretary Mellon, the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee, and Representatives Mondell, Madden and Campbell, so that the new revenue bill will be designed to raise $3,075,000,000 instead of $3,570,000,000 as under the present law. To effect this saving, heavy cuts were made in the estimates furnished by Secretary Mellon, the $200,000,000 for the Shipping Board being slashed in half, $100,000,000 taken from the War Department, $50,000,000 each from the Navy Department and the Railroad Administration, and $25,000,000 each from the Department of Agriculture and general expenditures, in addition to a scaling down of $170,000,000 in the public debt payments.

In accordance with the conference decision, the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee changed the revenue bill so as to reduce the expected revenue by $555,000,000. Taxes which had been estimated to yield $891,000,000 were to be repealed, and increases to produce $336,000,000 were inserted. The chief alterations were the repeal of the excess profits tax, retroactive to January 1, 1921, the elimination of surtax brackets above 32 per cent., the increase from 10 to 15 per cent. of the tax on net incomes of corporations, and the abolition of taxes on freight, passenger and Pullman traffic after January 1, 1922.

GETTING WALKED ON

The program called for the passage of the measure within a week after it is completed by the committee, and it will then go into the hands of the Senate Finance Committee, giving Congress an opportunity to adjourn for a month.

De Valera Rejects British Offer

PREMIER LLOYD GEORGE'S offer of Dominion self-government to Ireland has been rejected by Eamonn de Valera and, with the British government standing firmly against his demand for complete independence, the peace negotiations have reached a critical stage.

The text of the Premier's offer, which was made public, showed that his proposal of Dominion government included Irish autonomy in taxation and finance, with her own courts of law and judges, army for home defense, constabulary and police, postal service and control of all matters concerning education, agriculture, mines, forestry, labor, transport, trade, public health, health insurance and liquor trade. The Premier had stipulated that the Royal Navy should control the seas around Ireland, that recruiting for the British forces should be permitted, that no protective duties should be adopted and that Ireland should assume her share of the British debt.

Mr. de Valera's reply, after consultation with his colleagues, was that such conditions reduced Ireland to "a position of helpless dependence," and that her demand was for "political detachment free from imperialistic entanglements." He refused to permit the exclusion of Ulster from the settlement, Lloyd George having declared the Ulster government could not be abrogated except with its own consent, and proposed that the question should be submitted to external arbitration. He also proposed arbitration of the debt question.

Premier Lloyd George replied at once that there could be no compromise on the right of Ireland to secede from her allegiance to the King and that he could not consent to foreign arbitration of Irish questions.

There the matter rested pending the meeting of the Dail Eireann, the Irish Republican Parliament. Each side had left the way open for further exchanges, despite the firm tone of the letters, and it was hoped a basis might be found for continuing the negotiations.

COLONEL SAMUEL P. COLT DIES. Colonel Samuel P. Colt, long prominent in politics and chairman of the Board of Directors of the United States Rubber Company, died at his home at Bristol, Conn., after a paralytic stroke, at the age of sixty-nine.

ALLIES TO FORM RUSSIAN RELIEF COMMISSION. The Allied Supreme Council, at its Paris meeting, decided to form an international commission for Russian relief work which is to embrace all efforts, governmental and private, for that purpose. Details of the organization and of the means of sending help were referred to committees. Herbert Hoover was going ahead with his relief measures, and negotiations with Soviet representatives were in progress in Riga. The six Americans released from Moscow prisons had arrived at Reval, Estonia, and orders for the freeing of other Americans were issued.

POST IN PHILIPPINES OFFERED TO GENERAL WOOD. Major-General Leonard Wood will be named Governor General of the Philippines if the University of Pennsylvania, the trustees of which have elected him to be its head, will consent to his release, it was announced by Secretary Weeks. The general has indicated his willingness to accept the post, which carries a salary of $24,000 with a residence at government expense. A preliminary report by the Wood-Forbes Commission was said to have held that conditions in the islands do not warrant the immediate grant of independence.

PRESIDENT'S FATHER WEDS AGAIN. Dr. George T. Harding, father of the President, and Miss Alice Severns, who has been associated with him for several years in his practice at Marion, were married at Monroe, Mich., an event which caused surprise at the White House. Dr. Harding is seventy-six years old and his bride fifty-two. The President's mother died eleven years ago.

SPANISH CABINET RESIGNS. The cabinet of Premier Allendesalazar in Spain has resigned as a result of the Spanish defeats in Morocco and the formation of a new ministry has been entrusted to former Premier Maura. Reinforcements have been hurried to Morocco, but have not been able as yet to check the tide of rebel successes.

With the Hardings in the White House

SUCH busy days as these are at the White House and such busy days as they have been since on March 4 the President and Mrs. Harding came down from the Capitol, where he had been inducted into office, and took up their residence in the historic old mansion.

They have not only been tremendously busy days, but intensely interesting days also, and as one takes a quick mental review of the six months since the new administration came into power it is easy to understand the great wave of popularity that has swept the President and Mrs. Harding into the affections of the American people. The secret lies in the simple fact that they are so intensely human that they have a bona fide interest in people, and this interest has brought the White House into a more intimate touch with all of those who come into it than has been experienced in recent years. Some of the causes of this popularity can be illustrated by many little incidents that are of daily occurrence.

On the day that Mrs. Harding received the three thousand Daughters of the American Revolution who were attending their annual congress in Washington, she had several out-of-town friends with her for luncheon and as they left the handsome state dining-room she invited them to remain to help her in receiving her expected guests. One of the ladies said regretfully that she could not stay as the young daughter of a friend from the West who was attending an Eastern boarding-school had stopped over in Washington to spend the day with her and she would have to go back to the hotel to meet her. Mrs. Harding has a gift for finding ways out of difficulties and she suggested at once that the girl should join them at the White House.

"You know how it will delight a young girl to have an afternoon at the White House," she said. "Indeed, it is an opportunity which must not be missed, for it is a part of her education. The child will never forget it as long as she lives."

Without further delay a White House aide was despatched across Lafayette Park to the hotel and of course brought back a highly delighted and excited young girl. For three blissful hours she watched her gracious hostess, or at her suggestion wandered through the fascinating rooms.

"It was like a dream," exclaimed the happy little maiden when she related the incident, "just like a lovely dream to stand so near the President and Mrs. Harding that I could hear what they said to their guests. Afterwards Mrs. Harding herself walked through the state parlors telling me some of the events that had happened in the rooms. Why, I never will forget that afternoon. I know I shall remember it the longest day I live and when I am old and gray-headed, I will tell it to my grandchildren!"

ONE rainy day an entertainment was under way out at Walter Reed Hospital for the wounded men. The rain poured in torrents and several of those who were to have helped give the program failed to come. The women in charge were just beginning to fear that the afternoon was to be a failure when, quite unannounced and entirely unexpected, the President and Mrs. Harding walked in. Such a red-letter day as it then proved to be for the wounded men. The distinguished guests waived all ceremony and walked from chair to chair chatting with the occupants or talked with them in little groups in the various parts of the room and veranda. For more than an hour they remained with "my boys,"

Glimpses of Their Daily Life Which Reveal Them to Be "Just Folks"

By ABBY GUNN BAKER

President and Mrs. Harding greeting the wounded men at Walter Reed Hospital as Mrs. Harding delights to call the men who were wounded overseas, and before they left the President assured them that he would do everything in his power to aid the maimed soldiers in getting a new start in life.

The men who were blinded in the service have a peculiar tie with both the President and Mrs. Harding. They have visited the blind in the Red Cross Institute near Baltimore as well as those in the hospitals nearer Washington. One day a number of the men came to the White House to present to Mrs. Harding an exquisite woven basket they had made for her. Mrs. Harding was more than pleased with their work, and as she talked with them she allowed them to pass their deft fingers over her dress, her necklace, and even her face that they might "see" her as only the blind can see. One of the men said to her impulsively: "Oh, Mrs. Harding, you are so good, so good." Her reply was characteristic.

"Good," she repeated with spirit; "not at all, I only feel the obligation which every other right-minded American woman feels toward you brave boys who have given your sight, and who offered your lives for your country. It is not a matter of goodness, it is a matter of gratitude."

She is so democratic—is this wonderful First Lady who now presides at the White House. One day soon after the change in administration she and the wife of the Vice-President—who, by the way, is quite as democratic as is Mrs. Harding—were attending some Washington function together. All at once to her intense dismay Mrs. Coolidge found she was in the position that gave her precedence. "Oh, I am on the wrong side," she breathed in a tragic stage whisper in Mrs. Harding's ear. Mrs. Harding half stopped and the two looked at each other in consternation. Then for half a second both women suppressed a laugh as Mrs. Harding cheerfully whispered back, "Never mind—what difference does it make to us come on."

THESE, and many other incidents like them, have reminded me many times of a story one of Mrs. Harding's cousins told me a few days after the election last fall. She said that Mrs. Harding had had a wretched cold for a week and on election day was ill enough to have been in bed. But through all the exciting hours of the day she went about her Marion home as usual, greeting the many callers who came, scanning with Senator Harding the constantly arriving telegrams, and always ready with a joke for the newspaper men who brought the wires. But when in the late evening it became evident that the expected landslide to the Republican Party really had taken place, she stopped only long enough to congratulate the jubilant group of men surrounding her husband before slipping off to bed to nurse her torturing cold. Next morning the cousin who told the story went up to her room to see Mrs. Harding.

"Well, Florence," she said, "with all my heart I congratulate you. The victory grows more wonderful every hour."

The cold had settled in Mrs. Harding's head. She was horribly uncomfortable. She looked at her congratulator solemnly.

"Well—I don't know," she answered slowly, "whether we are to be congratulated or to be commiserated. Look at the condition of the world and think of the responsibility of the Presidency," and she hunted among the pillows for her handkerchief and sighed lugubriously. But in another moment she pushed the pillows up under her head with a vigorous punch and began laughing hilariously.

"Isn't it a joke for me to say such a thing as that when you and I both know if Warren had been defeated I would have been the most miserable woman in the world this morning instead of being the happiest? I am a regular fraud," she went on laughing as she applied the handkerchief to her demanding nose, "to say that I am scared out of my happiness by the responsibility, even as great as the responsibility is, for I am not. I am simply jubilantly happy over the election, and there is no use for me to try to pretend that I am not. I am no good pretending at anything anyway. I don't know how to do it."

That last sentence epitomizes Mrs. Harding in a word. She is "no good" at pretending, for she is thoroughly genuine.

ANOTHER reason for the popularity of the President and Mrs. Harding is that they have made themselves accessible to those who have legitimate business reasons for wanting to see

Daughters of American Revolution going in at the east entrance of the White House for Mrs. Harding's reception

God Measuring the Churches

A Sermon by REV. EDGAR DE WITT JONES, D.D.*

TEXT: Rev. 11:1—"And there was given me a reed like unto a rod; and the angel stood, saying, Rise, and measure the temple of God, and the altar, and them that worship therein."

THE heroic company for whom this book of Revelation was written understood its cryptic allusions. Through a period of dark and turbulent years, the first century Church conducted its meetings in secret; and by the aid of symbols, signs and passwords, continued its mission in the face of bitter and deadly persecution. The visions, figures, and cryptograms of Revelation, which have been the source of almost endless controversy brought warning and comfort to our brethren of the apostolic age. Assuming that this book was written primarily for the generation to which it was addressed, it does not follow that it contains no message for these latter days. The book is freighted with much that is profitable for every generation.

Interpreters of various schools of theology agree that the allusion in Rev. 11:1 is to the Church, its worship and conduct. God is represented as appraising His people and their worship. The apostle is bidden to discern the spiritual dimensions of the House of God.

First, he measures the area of the temple—not merely the physical area, for that were the least important. Some of the most spiritual congregations have worshipped in small and unimpressive edifices. Measure not the spaciousness or seating capacity, but observe how much of the whole life of the worshipper is to be found in the House of God. Do the worshippers bring their all to church? What of the vision range of the minister and the office bearers? Is the world objective of Jesus Christ kept constantly before the people, or are the ideals of the Temple provincial, narrow and mean?

It has sometimes been urged—and with good intention—not to bring workaday memories or thoughts of vocation into the House of God. There is a sense in which such advice is good; but unless it be qualified or explained, it may be misleading. Let men bring thoughts of shop, store, office and farm to the House of God; let women come with recollections of household duties, the training of children, the never-ending round of domestic cares. Thus worshipping, it may be that both men and women will come to perceive the intimate relation between daily toil and the Spirit Divine, and be strengthened accordingly.

GOD is everywhere measuring the churches today. Are they big enough spiritually to serve and save this generation? Are they sufficiently maintained to minister to every need of the community? Are they feeding the emotions and starving the intellect? Are they providing for the adult life of the congregation and ignoring the children? Are the churches measuring up to this need of the whole of life and supplying richly those great aids to faith that are necessary for the life abundant or, are they exclusive, snobbish and class-bound?

"Rise and measure the altar." The altar is the soul of the temple. The idea of sacrifice is as old as religion. When the artist paints primitive man at worship, he shows him kneeling before an altar on which a smoking sacrifice is laid. It is the altar that has given Christianity its supreme place among the world's religion. The communion of the Lord's Supper is more than a memorial; it is also a symbol. The broken bread and the fruit of the vine speak to us of His altar experience; but do they mirror in any way the altar in the lives of the worshippers? The very word "altar" is impressive; there is in it the idea of sacrificial service and gifts, the ministry of renunciation. A church is great in proportion to the measure of its altar life. An individual Christian is a power with God and man only as the altar bulks largely in his thought and deed.

First-century Christianity had no architecture worthy of name, no edifice even of the humbler kind. Its members met in upper rooms, caves of the earth, private homes—wherever they were able to come together and for the time be safe from the persecutors. The churches of that day boasted no "coffers" or material securities of any kind; they knew no organized life save of the slenderest; but they did possess the altar in a wondrous way. They shared their all with the humblest of earth, and gave themselves without reserve for a redeemed society.

How prominently the altar was in Paul's life. How noble are his flaming words; when replying to the critics who questioned his apostolic credentials, he cried: "Henceforth let no man trouble me; for I bear branded in my body the marks of Jesus." It was through the altar marks made by the lion which crunched his arm that the body of David Livingstone was identified before it was buried with impressive honors in Westminster Abbey.

"RISE and measure the altar," is a solemn injunction to modern Christians. What is the altar life of the average congregation? What is the local church doing for the community? What service, what sacrifice, what ministry to the unfortunate, the despondent, the outcast, the poor? What of the altar in the lives of the members? Is it strong or faint? Is pride still dominating the rank and file of the Christian commonwealth? Is prejudice still swaying the multitude of believers? Are avarice and greed corroding the hearts of those who acknowledge the Lordship of Jesus?

Have we learned nothing new concerning sacrifice since the great war? Eighty thousand of America's youth gave their lives to make the world safe for women and little children. What of us who possess vigor, influence and talent—what are we giving? What of the altar experience on our part to make Christianity vital and fruitful the world over. Is the offer a better prayer in public than any men of the official board; I thank God I am a more efficient churchman than any one else in the congregation." That standard of measurement is an abomination; it is mean, niggardly, contemptible!

There are those, also, who, while they scorn to measure themselves by others, are quite ready to measure themselves by themselves. These well-meaning folk look back over the years and see wherein they can trace a growth in spiritual things and thus contrasting present attainments with past, believe themselves to find ground for self-congratulation. This method of measuring is not so objectionable as the other, yet it is faulty and inadequate. In II Corinthians 10:12, the apostle alludes to Christians of that day who measured themselves by themselves, and he charged them with folly. The difficulty is that such measuring keeps one self-centered; it feeds pride, tickles vanity, chills enthusiasm, smothers the noblest impulses. Behold a more excellent way I show you:

GOD'S manner of measuring us is found in Jesus Christ, His son. Peter refers to Jesus as our example, and bids us follow in His steps. Paul in a memorable passage enjoins the followers of Christ at Ephesus to strive toward high ideals: "Till we all come in the unity of faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ." The night of His betrayal, Jesus gave to His disciples the new commandment, and bade them love one another even as He loved them. God, therefore, is measuring the temple, and the altar, and them that worship therein, by and through His Son. Consider how fully His measurements fill the requirement of the text.

How wonderfully His spirit fills the temple, ministering to the whole life. Lo, His abundant provisions for the old, the middle-aged, the young and the little children! No one is forgotten or overlooked; the outcast, the poor, the notorious sinner, the toiler, the housewife, the scholar, the peasant—all are objects of His love and consideration. The sympathies of Jesus, like the waters of some great ocean whose waves lap the shores of many Continents, reach every experience of human life. He is everybody's Christ. He is the same yesterday, today and forever. If lifted up in the thoughts and deeds of His followers, He will draw all men unto Himself.

In Jesus' life the altar was supreme. He came not to be ministered unto. The spirit of sacrifice in His life permeates the pages of the Gospels, as Mary's ointment filled the home of Simon the leper with its sweet fragrance. He was among the people as one who serveth. He set His face toward Jerusalem and offered Himself upon the high altar of the Cross for all mankind. Thus, he has become, as the author of the Hebrew Epistle has aptly phrased it—"our altar."

WITH what vastness of mind and affection does Jesus meet the yearnings of the soul that seeks Him. What amplitude in the spirit of Jesus. No petty prejudices, no sordid ambition, no greed for place or possession, warped or dwarfed His character. The words that fell from His lips were words of ocean-like breadth: "all," "whosoever," "everyone"—these were the phrases oftenest upon His lips. How His abundant love, His whole-hearted forgiveness, His gracious dealings with publicans and sinners rebuke the oftentimes bigotry of some who claim Him as Lord and Master. Measured by this high standard, how small are even the most spiritual of men and women; compared with His sacrificial acts, how insignificant the most generous of the churches appear!

In the deepest sense, the spirit and the principles of Jesus are measureless. The religion of His day was that of the stated feast, the stipulated tithe, the arbitrary service, the formal and stereotyped Pharisaism. Jesus came with His large outlook upon life, His deep and penetrating insight into human nature. He taught the giving of good measure, pressed down, shaken together and running over.

It is not possible to weigh or measure infinite love. No canvas is large enough for Jesus Christ. Men have been trying for centuries to summarize the character of Christ in sermon, lecture, essay, and biography. I recall the title of one of these multifarious books with Jesus as theme—a title of becoming modesty and singular good taste: "Jesus, an Unfinished Portrait." Unfinished is here rightly used. What artist, orator, preacher, essayist, philosopher, has appraised wholly that great Divine Soul, whether on canvas, in marble, or printed page. God be praised for so lofty an ideal, so perfect a standard, so sinless a life as He hath given unto the world in His beloved Son, Jesus.

Our Sunday Service at Home

The Christian Herald Sermon is now read in many Homes as a Sunday Evening Service, a simple form of conducting which is outlined below. Neighbors should be cordially invited

Invocation—"The Lord's Prayer"—all join.

Scripture Reading—Psalm 40: first 8 verses; Reliance upon God.

Sermon—"GOD MEASURING THE CHURCHES"—To be read aloud by the head of the household or his substitute.

Requests for Prayer—These may be offered by any of those present who feel led to do so. The requests may be forwarded to Pastor Sheldon, in New York, for submission to the Prayer League.

Closing Hymn—"Rock of Ages," or "Now the Day is Over."

Benediction—By Pastor Charles M. Sheldon, to be read aloud:

Gracious Lord: If the truth of thy Word as it has been read today has touched our hearts, may we use it to help others as it has helped us. And as we go back to our work, may its burdens be changed into songs, and its cares be translated into joys, and its fears into faith, and its drudgery into the divine blessing of working with Him who made furniture in the Carpenter's shop. In Jesus' name we ask it. AMEN.

Cross only a symbol, a mere emblem to adorn a necklace, or ornament for a watch-fob? Yes, measure the altar and let us know the truth, even if it be an exposure of our meagre accomplishments in the realm of the spiritual.

"And Them That Worship Therein." The measuring passes now from the temple and the altar to the individual. True the individual has been included in both the measurement of the temple and the altar, but a more personal and individual appraisal must now be submitted to. God is about to take our measure in soul wealth. What have we for endurance? How much patience do we possess? Is the forgiving spirit large with us? How long will we harbor a grudge? To what distance and inconvenience are we willing to go in order to right a wrong? Can we see the weak wronged without indignation? Can we exult in the downfall of an enemy? Do we try to be just to those whom we do not like? Can we bear this measuring rod of Almighty God without a sense of littleness? Are we growing in the great graces of the spirit? The questions are personal, searching, persistent, inescapable. "Lord is it I? Is it I? Is it I?"

BY WHAT standard does God measure the churches, the area of the temple, the altar and them that worship therein? A popular custom is to measure ourselves by others, and observe with pride wherein our accomplishments are larger and our growth more considerable than those of our neighbors, friends, fellow church-members. A man looks about him, for instance, and after the manner of a certain infamous Pharisee, soliloquizes: "As compared with other folks I'm a pretty good kind of a Christian; I attend church more regularly than my neighbors next door; I can

The Overflowing Cup

SUNDAY. Psa. 23-5. "My cup runneth over." It is the suggestion of abundance which is conveyed in these most familiar words. The guest is in the tent of his host, and there is no hint of stinginess in the hospitality. It is not as in Cana of Galilee, when the good man of the feast had the horrible surprise of discovering that they were running short of wine almost before the feast had well begun. One can dimly imagine the thoughts and feelings of the guests at the wedding. There would be many a side-long glance as the mean measures were handed round. There would be much significant lifting of the brows. There would be many a whispered interpretation of the shortage, and the interpretations would never err on the generous side. But the irritation of the guests was nothing compared with the discomfort of the host. He was horrified until all his trouble was ended by the gracious courtesy and power of the Lord. But this psalmist's Host has made no mean provision. Nor are His supplies just level with the demand. The grace of the Lord does not just balance the necessity and leave nothing over. There is always a surplus at the feast. The want is met with abundance. Satisfaction culminates in wonder. This man's cup runneth over! And that is everywhere the Scripture teaching concerning the boundless hospitality of the Divine Host. We are cheered by the promise that whatever necessity we bring to the door of our Father's house is welcomed with overflowing goodness, and the need is absolutely buried in the multitude of God's mercies.

Here, then, is a familiar sentence which reveals the overflowing bounty—"Where sin aboundeth grace doth much more abound." That is an almost surprising encounter. I did not imagine that anything could be bigger than my sin. It was the biggest thing I knew. If I take time, and let my mind and memory run across the years, my sin seems to pile up to mountain heights! This is true even of the sins I can remember. But there are countless others which memory cannot recall. And there are all those which an evil nature never recognizes as sin—the sophistries which moved about as decent presences: the things which I labelled "smartness," "cleverness," and then persuaded myself that the labels made them so: the sins of aggression: the sins of neglect: the sins of indolence and indifference! Mountains of them!

And when I bring these mountainous things to the Lord, what then? Where sin abounds, what then? "Grace doth much more abound." There is a bigger thing than my sin. Sin is out-topped by grace. Out-topped? Aye, as Mount Everest out-tops the hills that reveal themselves from my chamber window. Out-topped? Aye, as a child's sand-heap is overwhelmed by the incoming weight and glory of God's amazing sea. "There's a wideness in God's mercy like the wideness of the Sea." Yes, and a depth, too. And all this is true, true in the experience of all humble, believing souls who lay their dark necessity before the Lord. It is met and countered by God's grace, and the grace of God in Christ Jesus buries our guilt and sin as in an unfathomable sea. Grace does not just meet our sin in uncertain balancings; it buries it all together. The forgiveness is not stingy. Our cup runneth over.

Here is another sentence revealing the fulness of the divine hospitality. "They gathered of the fragments that remained, twelve basketfuls." No wonder that the prodigal son, thinking of such a Host, said: "In my Father's house there is bread enough and to spare." Recall some of the deep and varied hungers of the soul. Think of the hunger for divine union. Think of the hunger for the perfecting of all our powers. Think of the hunger for the peace which is spiritual harmony, and for the joy which is spiritual health. And bread is needed for all these hungers. And blessed be God, all our cravings are the pledges of their fulfilment. The very variety of our hungers is an index to the manifold grace of the Lord. Our hungers are our schoolmasters to bring us to Christ. And when we come to Him, there is bread enough and to spare. "The half hath not been told." God's hospitality buries our necessity. His bounty overwhelms our needs.

And so, on God's side, the gifts are always abounding. His measure is good measure, passed down, shaken together, running over. J. H. J.

"Safety First"

MONDAY. Acts 16 : 28. "Do thyself no harm." "Safety first" is not a Christian motto as applied to personal conduct. Our motto must be "Duty first." In ordinary affairs, however where there is no principle at stake, "Safety first" is a good motto, wise and eminently Christian. Here was a restraining voice, a hand laid upon a man about to do a rash and foolish thing. Suppose the prisoners in the Philippian jail had escaped? Would the suicide of the jailer have helped matters? It seems to have been a sort of Oriental impulse to escape trouble by escaping life. This is not the Christian way of escaping trouble. We know that death is no effective escape from self.

The only real way of escaping self is by getting into another Self. The Philippian jailer soon learned it. He was added to the number of those who were being saved. He found his better self in Christ. The words of Paul to the jailer are a suggestive exhortation on the plane of practical affairs. Each of us is his worst enemy, in fact his only enemy. We may do ourselves harm. Many do, some blindly, some with full knowledge of the peril they incur.

Religion has its admonitory voices. The Bible is a compendium of wisdom and warning. Over the Ten Commandments might well be written the motto, "Safety first." What harm do we inflict upon ourselves most commonly? Dr. Glover of Cambridge says, "The curse of the world is failure to develop." It is a tragedy that so many of us let whole areas of our minds lie waste.

The author of "The Journal of a Disappointed Man" confesses: "During the last twelve months I have undertaken a complete upheaval. The whole bias of my life has gone over from the intellectual to the ethical. I now know that goodness is the chief thing." After all, our great sin is neglect. We neglect to avail ourselves of God's grace. We bear burdens we need not bear. We fight battles alone when we might have an omnipotent Ally. C. C. A.

"None Other Name"

TUESDAY. Acts 4 : 12. "None other name under heaven that is given among men, wherein we must be saved." In all the false religions and philosophies of the world there is no intimation of any way by which a sinner can escape from his mislived past. Such a way is provided alone in the expiatory sacrifice of Christ. If you close that door, you say, in fact, not only that man is in a desperate case, but that the God who created him is without love in leaving him there.

People who abjure the Christian religion are, as a rule, fond of vociferating that God is love; but the God whom they prefer sits in his high heaven with eyes as pitiless as those of the Sphinx, unmoved by generations of his children who in caravans pass on to dusty death.

This, O unbeliever, is where your way of thinking brings you! D. J. B.

Our Alliances

WEDNESDAY. I Sam. 30 : 13. "To whom longest thou?" David put this question to a stranger whom he met on the road and the stranger told David the name of the master he was serving. The question in these days is as direct and the answer is expected from us all. The world demands how and where we stand. Neutrality is an impossibility. We reveal our viewpoint as much by our silence as by our speech. God wants to know where we stand; Jesus Christ wants to know; the Church wants to know. The Kingdom individually and collectively demands that we put ourselves on record for or against. If we believe in the Church, that belief is our creed. If we do not believe in the Church, that too is our creed.

The unorganized indifference of the Christian Church does more harm than the organized unrighteousness of the powers of sin. Sin trades on indifference and prospers on silence. Therefore there are three questions it behooves us to answer. Where in the world of self are we?—Our thoughts and attitude. Where in the world's world are we?—Great secular matters and civic affairs. Where in God's world are we?—Christian ideals and righteous standards. A long time ago, in the twilight of history God asked, "Adam, where are thou?" Today in the noon-tide glare of the twentieth century He is asking all the sons and daughters of Adam the same question. The years to come shall determine how we have answered that question, not so much by what we have said but by the alliances we have formed, the ideals we have cultivated and the interests we have given impetus with our consent. R. B.

The New Discovery

THURSDAY. John 6 : 68. "We believe and are sure that thou art that Christ, the Son of the living God." The Christian life, like the natural life, is one of growth and development. The beginnings may be small and usually are, but the possibilities are beyond our conception.

That was a great and momentous day, in the life of Peter and John when they made the acquaintance of Jesus, and resolved to unite themselves to Him.

How they must have looked back to that day as the birthday of their Christian life, the beginning of their real growth in heart and character!

The gracious words spoken by the Master, the miraculous and healing touch of His hand, the manner in which He managed always to enter into man's need; His divine sympathy, His passion to minister to all, His absolute unselfishness, His preparedness for all the emergencies of their discipleship—all these combined to show the disciples that He whom they followed had riches unsearchable, and that their life with Him meant an ever increasing growth and development in heart and character. This is one of the most beautiful truths of the Christian life, that we shall always be making new discoveries, entering upon inspiring experiences, and exploring fresh and untried pathways. The best, the richest, is always ahead, and true service to the Christ will be as the dawning light, that shines more and more unto the perfect day.

Patently and lovingly Christ sought, both by precept and example, to make them see that unselfishness is the chief virtue, and self-forgetting service, the standard of all true greatness. There is nothing we need more in the Christian life of today than to discover this wondrous teaching, and to give it absolute right-of-way. W. S. S.

Christ's Contribution to Life

FRIDAY. I Tim. 4 : 8. "Having promise of the life that now is." There is a tendency in our day to emphasize what may be called the utilitarian view of the Christian religion. But why condemn it by calling it utilitarian? What William James calls pragmatism and what Bergson calls activism are the same. The idea is to test a philosophy by its actual working. "By their fruit ye shall know them." It was an advance agent of this philosophy who said, thirty years ago: "You say Christianity is false. But you admit Christianity produces results in the individual life and in society which what you call Truth can not accomplish. Thereby you prove your truth false and your falsehood true." This is a short and easy way to deal with unbelief.

Christ has a program for the individual life. What is it? There is no doubt He enables us to face the facts of life undaunted. There are the facts of pain and death. In the face of pain, Christ still believed in the Father's goodness. In the face of death, He still clung to His belief in life. This is the fruit of faith. Then Christ enables us to meet life's crisis with calmness and strength. The parable of the wise and foolish virgins is Christ's doctrine of crisis. Crisis must be met by always living at our best.

Moreover, Christ enables us to walk with superior dignity and hope along the dim and dusty way of common things. There is a prayer which runs, "Give me, dear Lord, Thy magic common things." It is thoroughly Christian. This is the way to God—"o'er moor and fen, o'er crag and torrent, till the night is gone." The moor is beautiful if we are in good company. The fen is beautiful if our hearts are hopeful. Beyond these hedgerows lieth the land of far distances. Death is but an opening through the hedge. C. C. A.

The Sense of His Presence

SATURDAY. Ex. 33 : 15. "If Thy presence go not with us, carry us not up hence." If a universe of worlds and laws is all for the children of God, we know that the heavenly Father will not desert us during the brief journey across the isthmus of time.

Think of fishes trying to find the sea and birds searching for the air, when they are swimming and flying in the element of their lives all the while. So humanity reaches out after God, not always realizing that He is here, now and everywhere continually. While ocean and air, flowers and sunlight whisper of His Presence, He comes nearer when the soul of the Infinite touches that of His child with healing, saving and keeping power. We are a part of His breath and being, living by Him and the words of His power. In the face of nature and in the faces of our loved ones, we can behold pictures of the face of God till we see Him as He is, face to face.

John Bunyan's blind child never saw her father's face nor read his writings; but she knew her father's heart of love better than those who only read the dreamer's pages. She could respond to his tender touch and feel his arms of endearment. Are we not God's blind children, feeling after Him in our darkness till, under the shadow of His wings, we abide and hear the music of His voice? With love's far-seeing eyes we bring Him near and are sensible of His intimate Presence. The eyes of faith and hope are not blind, when we are willing to gaze upon His beauty. In the garden of the soul, His presence is visible as He comes to meet us and love us; He who is never weary giveth power to the faint; He increaseth strength and becomes to us the all and in all. E. # From Philippi to Athens

International Sunday-School Lesson for September 4

Acts 16:19 to 17:15

By REV. SAMUEL D. PRICE, D.D.

LABOR Day Sunday shows in the Sunday-school lesson study that Paul, the tent maker, works hard with hands, head and heart. Union hours are undreamed of by this itinerant evangelist, and no labor for Jesus Christ and his fellow man is beneath his dignity. At midnight or at noon he is ready to help his fellows. He is a master workman in saving a life, saving a soul or teaching the Word effectively.

When reform through religious activity closes the pocketbook many still are eager to stop the reform and to still the reformer. That was the way it worked at Philippi when the syndicate of big men who owned the little girl could no longer fool the public through her sooth-saying. Paul and Silas were dragged from the home of Lydia or arrested en route to the riverside place of prayer and beaten after a semblance of a trial before the rulers in the market-place. If Paul asserted his Roman citizenship the call was not heard in the uproar, or it did not avail this time as it did at Jerusalem on a later occasion. Paul may have been silent as to his rights, believing that God would bring deliverance in another way. The Christian is not always saved from experiencing suffering, but he is always made strong in the Lord to endure his sufferings.

These yoke-fellows in the Gospel were foot-bound in the inner prison, and the hour was midnight. Did they conclude that they had mistaken the message in the Macedonian call? The answer is their prayer-meeting with numerous hymns interspersed. Silas has been called the singer like Sankey with Moody, Alexander with Torrey, or Rodeheaver with Sunday. Bound feet are no indication of a bound heart. At just such times the Christian has an outreach that effectively lays hold on God. It was good for Paul and Silas that each had the companionship of the other, but best of all for both was the fact of the conscious presence of Jesus Christ.

A PRAYER-MEETING of the right sort has a social effect. It was that way on this occasion. Others were in the same prison and their consciences were giving them pain because of real guilt. The night is fearfully long when one cannot sleep by reason of thinking of sins which have been committed. Lewd songs had often been sung by vicious men in that prison, but this night sweet messages declaring faith in God, the assurance of His presence and the peace that passeth all understanding were heard coming from that inner dungeon. While the prisoners were listening intently the earthquake came and shook the doorposts from their sockets, stocks fell apart, and all hurried toward freedom. It only requires a moment to stain your soul forever by a sin, or to find salvation in Jesus Christ through conversion.

The jailer also is awakened. He leaps to a conclusion without reckoning upon God's part in the upheaval and draws the sword of cowardice to avoid the trial at Rome. Though Paul is still suffering from the flagellation of yesterday he is ready to do good to those who have persecuted and despitefully used him and Silas. The hand of the would-be suicide is stayed as Paul calls out the facts, and then there is a blessed miracle of grace in that early morning hour. That dialogue has been used of God in soul-saving almost as much as were the words of Jesus to Nicodemus in John 3:16.

"Sirs, what must I do to be saved?"
"Believe on the Lord Jesus, and thou shalt be saved, thou and thy house."

The activity of penitence follows conversion from sin. At once the self-expression of the jailer begins: he is baptized, together with "all his," just as soon as he, himself, has washed the stripes of these men of God. There are some duties that we cannot delegate to others. That night the jailer must have surprised the other keepers and the released prisoners as they beheld the loving servant perform the work of the tender physician. The man-beater proved that he had found the Christ by doing Christ-like service.

These lessons must be always related to our every-day world. The subject of progress in prison reform during the past century is one for profitable discussion. Can the unfortunates be reformed while in prison or is it just a place of punishment for them? There are many Christian workers who count it a great joy to go regularly to jails, penitentiaries and reform schools that they may minister in things pertaining to the Kingdom.

A practical outcome of the study of this lesson would be for every Sunday school or class to make certain that there is some worth-while gospel ministry in each public institution in its vicinity. Do not guess about it. Find out, and if nothing is being done, do not rest until this Christian ministry is started. This is a real piece of work for organized adult classes.

A CHRISTIAN has dignity and can assert his rights. This Paul does when he is invited to leave town quietly. He requests the magistrates to come and get the beaten, though uncondemned Roman. This is done with all due form, and Paul and Silas go to the house of Lydia for another meeting of prayer and thanksgiving. Then they go forward to places where other sheep need shepherding, though they may not be aware of their needs. Amphipolis, Appolonia and Thessalonica are reached in turn. You will find rich opportunities for informational study as you become acquainted with the history connected with all the places mentioned in Paul's travels. For example, study about Thessalonica, modern Salonika, from the time of Alexander the Great. In Acts 17:1-9 you will learn what Paul experienced there before he left with Silas, by night, for Berea.

Careful Bible study was the habit of at least some in Berea. They "examined the Scriptures daily, whether these things were so." The study of God's Word was the work of Jesus. Whatever else one may know he is genuinely ignorant if he is not acquainted with the facts in the Scriptures. Then he should understand what the Bible says to HIM about relationships in society here and also about the eternal Hereafter. This exhortation to Bible study should be related to the statement about the jailer and his family being baptized. One of the greatest needs in the life of the individual, the home and the church is the establishment of the Family Altar. The Christian Herald in carrying on its propaganda in this matter is rendering an incalculable good.

As you journey with Paul have in mind the letters which he wrote later to the various churches. Read those epistles as you study about each community. There is the message to the Philippians and the two letters to the Thessalonians. These letters will be mentioned in turn as we come to the city from which they were written.

There are three valuable inexpensive books about Paul and his work which have been written by David James Burrell, D.D. They are "Paul's Campaigns," "Paul's Companions," and "Paul's Letters." Such books make profitable reading in connection with the lesson studies on Paul which we will follow during the remainder of this year. These and other books which are recommended from time to time can be purchased through the Book Department of the Christian Herald. The books are named, however, solely in the interest of the readers of these lesson studies. We are always seeking to know Paul better, and through him to know his Christ.

The Flight of the Golden Eagles

the house, said I'd just have to move out, he was tired of me being always so behind. I was just heart-broke. We lived in that same little house when Mr. Coaly died, and anyway I couldn't afford to move and didn't know where to turn.

"And then Saturday along come Mrs. Leslie to call on me. Of course I just poured out all my troubles to her, as we all do, I guess. 'Why,' says she, 'don't worry for a minute. I've got ten dollars here I can spare just as well as not—it's my own, for my own pleasure, and I want to give it to you. That gives me more pleasure than anything else I could do with it.'"

"And," says Mrs. Coaly, 'I just come from Mr. Jaynes' office, where I been to pay him his rent.'"

"Well, here was a pretty how-to-do. The other two were made right up, and I thought Providence was in it. But this looked more like the workings of someone else. And they were made up by those who could afford to do it and only needed something to spur 'em to the giving. But this—"

"When I come to think it over I was mad, just downright mad. Mr. Jaynes belongs to our church and is worth land knows how much, and threatening to turn a poor woman out o' house and home! I was pretty near his office right then, but I believe I could have walked a mile, the frame o' mind I was in."

"Soon as I could get away from Mrs. Coaly, who was still calling Mrs. Leslie an angel and saying she was going to go over whenever she had any 'absent time' and help with the parsonage work, I rushed right up to that office, and I gave that man a good piece of my mind. He was too amazed to sass back at first and then when he tried to explain I just wouldn't listen to any explanations. I was too busy telling him what I thought of him."

"At last he just threw up his hands and yelled;

"Land sakes, woman! Hush up! I'll give you your ten-dollar gold piece back, and Mrs. Coaly can live in that house till the crack o' doom and pay when she pleases. Only stop this little flow o' speech o' yours before you scare off some of my clients and make me too much ashamed to walk the streets in daylight."

"SO THAT gold eagle came back to roost. But neither is that the end. I don't wonder you're amazed. So was I."

"Next day I was going past the Hawley place, and who should I see but their little cripple girl walking on crutches."

"'Why Jean Hawley,' I says, 'I didn't know you could get about on crutches.'"

"'No more did I,' she says, 'But when I tried I could. And you can't guess where I got these nice shiny crutches. See the rubber at that end, and the nice soft plush up here!'"

"'Yes, I can guess in one guess,' I told her. 'It was Mrs. Leslie.'"

"'Yessir,' she says. 'How did you know?'"

"'Humph!' I says, kind of wearily by this time, I'm afraid. You know I told you I didn't want you to be exactly like Mrs. Leslie. 'That's easy. I know Mrs. Leslie. Where do you suppose she bought 'em?'"

"'At Mr. Dwight's Drug Store. She said so.'"

"'I was 'most too tired to move, but I was afraid there was no time to be lost, so I hustled right down to Dwight's and told him all about it.'"

"'Don't let that gold piece get away,' I told him, 'till I've had a chance to redeem it.'"

"'I won't,' he promised, 'and I'll give two dollars toward the fund.'"

"'So'll I,' says his clerk. 'Mrs. Leslie's been mighty good to my wife.'"

"'I don't know the lady,' says a traveling man who was there, 'but the case sounds interesting. Here are my two dollars.'"

"'Oh, pshaw,' says Dwight. 'Let's make it three-thirty apiece. Here's your gold piece, Mrs. Johns. Better put it in a cage this time.'"

"Yes, there was one last gold piece, and I was hoping she might have got a new hat or a new waist or something for herself, though I couldn't see any sign of it when I met her."

"A LONG toward the end of the week a registered letter came for me. I couldn't think who could be sending it. I was quite excited when I opened it and found—yes, actually, that last gold eagle, and a letter from the Leslie girls. They were in the city going to college and boarding themselves. Their mother had written them about her birthday and the five gold eagles, and she had sent them one to buy them some little extras to eat. She was worried for fear they might economize too much for the good of their health."

"'But we know mother,' wrote Ruth. 'She has likely parted with more of those gold pieces that you folks so kindly gave her for her own use. She can never seem to see her own needs, others' needs loom so big. And she does need so much—has needed things for years. We want her to have them. We can never be grateful enough to you women for making it possible. We are all right. Simple living is good for the complexion and may help us reduce!'"

"Reduce! And they about as fat as knitting needles."

"'I called up Mrs. Wells and some of the others that very day.'"

"'We've got our eagles all home again,' I says, 'but how in tunket are we going to make them do their proper duty by Mrs. Leslie? And as for those girls of hers, how about a box, say on Saturday afternoon? We can pack it here and plan about getting those eagles to Mrs. Leslie at the same time.'"

"'I wish you could have seen that box—roast chicken and cakes and cookies and doughnuts and jelly and canned fruit, and vegetables and butter and a tin pail of fresh eggs, and ham and bacon and honey and candy and nuts and fruit, and goodness knows what all. We tried to put in some things that would keep and not have to be eaten all at once and kill the poor girls with our kindness. It was a good deal more than any ten dollars' worth. Ruth made a good bargain that time. And it was only what we could have done long before if we had only thought of it. We didn't miss those things a bit, and the letter we got from those girls! Land!"

"BUT how to get that money back. 'There's only one thing to do,' Mrs. Wells says. 'It's to buy the things and see that she wears 'em. Give me that money and I'll attend to it.'"

"Mrs. Wells was a master hand and I knew she would put it through if mortal could."

"I never got full particulars, but I know Mrs. Wells somehow explained in her jolly way to Mrs. Leslie that we were not satisfied with the amount of clothes she got for that amount of money, and that we had corralled some of the eagles that had tried to get away, and now Mrs. Wells was there to sort of guide their next flight."

"So she took our little preacher's—no, our preacher's little wife—down to Mr. Bean's store, and what she got for that fifty dollars would amaze anyone who didn't know Mr. Bean and how generous he was."

"So the next Sunday morning we had the joy of seeing our preacher's wife dressed as a preacher's wife ought to be—not so fine as to shame the poor, nor so poor as to shame the rich, but so nice we were all proud of her. And what's more, all this commotion and excitement stirred up the board and they added five hundred dollars to Mr. Leslie's salary, and, more astonishing yet, the salary, like any other salary in the world except a preacher's, was to be paid every month."

"I wrote to Janie and told her that if she ever before invested ten dollars that grew to six hundred in two weeks, I was some surprised."

"Now come and see those plants I was telling you about. The six o'clock whistle will blow any minute, and your preacherman will be home for supper, and probably think you've gone back to mother!"

Making the Farm Attractive

THAT the farmer, speaking collectively, is essential to the well-being of the nation and the world is a proposition so self-evident that it needs no argument. And yet the trend of population is steadily away from the farm and toward the cities and towns. All writers on economics and students of sociology agree that the congestion of great cities is morally unhealthy; a menace to our national life and proper development.

What is the matter? Why do the most capable and most ambitious young men and young women leave the farms and go to the cities?

The reason is evident. They go because they believe the city offers better business opportunities and a more desirable social environment. You may say that they are mistaken and that they will be disillusioned by experience. Perhaps so, but the fact remains that this desire for a fuller life and for enlarged opportunities is the impelling force which drives them from the land on which they were born.

What is the remedy? Make farm life so attractive, both from a business and social standpoint that it will overcome the lure of the city. How is that to be done? That, of course, is easier asked than answered, and yet I think it can be answered.

Man naturally loves the soil. It is natural for him to love to plant and till. He loves to watch the development of plant life, and especially if he has sown the seed from which it sprang. The city man, born in the country, never forgets the scenes of his youth and in the hour of his greatest triumph, longs for the green fields and woodlands of his childhood.

BUT for the most part farm life is a life of drudgery and isolation. No other class works such long hours or enjoys so little of social recreation. The financial rewards are not proportioned to the amount of toil, exposure and hardship incurred. In no other business is there so much of risk and uncertainty. The farmer's crops are always subject to the vicissitudes of the weather and his flocks and herds are always liable to be decimated by disease. In the market, he is subject to the dictation of the buyer of his product and the seller of those things he needs in the conduct of his business.

The farmer is the only producer of commodities who buys at retail and sells at wholesale. The packer, the manufacturer, the money-lender, the wholesale and retail merchants manage to shift their share of taxation on to the shoulders of their customers, but the farmer can not shift his, and he is compelled to pay taxes not only on what he owns but on what he does not own.

The cities and town build magnificent schools; the farmer pays for them and sends his own children to inferior schools, poorly equipped, poorly taught and for the most part, with as dreary and uninviting environment as can be imagined.

The remedy for farm conditions is co-operation. The farmers must get together and control the markets, instead of dancing always to the other fellow's music. The old, unlovely country school must give way to the consolidated rural grade and high-school, with modern, beautiful buildings and ample campus, laid out under the direction of the best landscape artists.

The science of agriculture must be studied to vastly increase production, and the science of distribution learned, so that there will no longer be the wide gap between the producer and consumer. The ideal country social life must be developed, so that it will offer greater attractions than the life in the cities.

In short, the causes which drain the country and crowd the cities must be removed.

Thy Will Be Done—With My Mind

E. L., C. E., and B. Y. P. U. Matt. 6:7-15

BEFORE we can efficiently use our hands or feet for Jesus Christ we must use our minds. Head, heart and hand are an effective trilogy for kingdom building. Head religion alone makes for cold intellectualism. Heart religion alone makes for an overplus of ardor minus sane and practical conduct. In the seventeenth verse of the thirteenth chapter of John's gospel are these words: "If ye know these things, happy are ye if ye do them." This saying of Jesus contains the whole philosophy of the Christian life.

The demand for the day is a religion that works. The time was when a man was revered for what he knew, but mere knowledge is discounted at the bank of reality. Then there was a time when the heart was elevated above the head and a man was honored for what he felt. In this practical age the hand takes precedence of both head and heart. We are approaching that day not so far away when neither head nor heart nor hand will be stressed in particular, but all three in general with emphasis on the head. Thinkers are needed in the pews as well as in the pulpits. Planners for kingdom extension are as necessary among the people as they are among the pastors.

We are familiar with the story of the boy and the tea kettle. Long he watched the steam as it poured out of the kettle, seeing the steam push the lid up, and he thought, "That steam has some power; I wonder if that power could not be made to do some work?" So he used his mind, thought the matter through, made some experiments and there came to commerce and industry the steam engine. There is a great deal of steam going to waste in the shape of man- and woman-power and we are in need of a James Watts in every young people's organization to harness that power and hitch its strength to the wheels of the kingdom. God gave us a mind to use and dedicate and consecrate so that we might be able to see beneath the surface of things and honor Him by using our minds to do his will.

Peter saw in the "mind's eye" the new heavens and the new earth. First the vision, then the task; first the diagram, then the doing; first the blueprint, then the business. Pope said, "Strength of mind is exercise, not rest." Robert Browning said, "Measure your mind's height by the shade it casts." Milton said, "The mind is its own place and in itself can make a heaven of hell, a hell of heaven." Suppose all clever men and women, intellectual leaders and brainy persons, were to dedicate their minds for the plans and programs of the Kingdom? What a wonderful world we would then have in a very short time. Well has it been said,

"Were half the power that fills the world with terror,
Were half the wealth bestowed on camps and courts,
Given to redeem the human mind from error,
There were no need of arsenals and forts."

With the Hardings in the White House

them, as well as to those who wish simply to make a call of respect and who come properly introduced. And so many people want to see them! It seems as though Washington has been crowded with strangers almost continuously since the inauguration, and apparently every stranger has had an errand either at the White House or at the executive offices. The President's business day begins early, he is often at the desk in his office before nine o'clock. Not infrequently his appointments for the day begin at that hour. Tuesday and Friday his schedule is kept clear for the cabinet meetings, but on other days the hours until noon are filled with appointments with the members of Congress or with other men of note. During the noon hour, and often running into his luncheon hour, he receives delegations—and seemingly almost all the patriotic, civic, educational, scientific, religious, political, and innumerable other organizations throughout the country have sent their representatives to see him. He receives them all with marvelous patience and a grace that wins every heart. In addition to them there are always many private individuals who come with letters of introduction or accompanied by their sponsors.

The luncheon hour at the White House is from one to two o'clock and by two-thirty, almost every day, the appointments for the White House commence. Sometimes a new diplomatic envoy is to be received and when he arrives with his retinue he is received with great formality by the President in the blue state parlor. More often it is a delegation representing some society and then Mrs. Harding receives with the President, and if it is a large body the east room is used.

Almost every afternoon Mrs. Harding receives some of her friends with perhaps some distinguished out-of-town guests, at a charming little tea in the red room. Miss Harlan, her gifted secretary, assists her at a handsomely equipped tea-table. Mrs. Harding is more than fortunate in her secretary. Miss Harlan comes from one of Washington's notable families, is the daughter of the late Justice Harlan of the Supreme Court, and has always moved in the exclusive social circles of the National Capital. She knows official life and all of the intricate problems of precedence, and she has a wide acquaintance in all official circles. This is of infinite service in her trying position, but better than that Miss Harlan is a broad-minded, rarely gifted young woman with most excellent judgment. Like her scholarly father she is a member of the Presbyterian Church and she has also his genial, sunny nature and his faculty for making friends. She is Mrs. Harding's right-hand aide and a material asset in the present popularity of the White House.

THE President and Mrs. Harding are constantly doing unexpected kindly things. One day recently, the Salvation Army was having a sale of flowers and in mid-afternoon they ran out of flowers. One of the ladies in charge had an appointment at the White House and while there she told Mrs. Harding of the flower shortage. Instantly the chateau of the White House went to the telephone, called the head gardener and in a remarkably short time that functionary appeared at the Salvation Army headquarters with a huge basket of blossoms from the White House gardens, and presented them with the good wishes of the mistress of the mansion.

There are so many stories of this kind which could be told of our new Chief Executive and his lovely wife, but I know the readers of the Christian Herald will be especially interested in the following:

One afternoon a few weeks ago Mrs. Harding was receiving the board members of the Washington College Women's Club, and as one of the ladies expressed their appreciation she added that she feared Mrs. Harding was taxing herself too greatly in meeting so many. The reply was the unconscious revelation of Mrs. Harding's keen feeling of the responsibility of her position.

"Perhaps I am trying to do too much," she said, "but I am particularly anxious to meet the representatives of the women's clubs because we women have so recently attained suffrage. I want to help the women of the country to understand their government and their duty to the government. For that reason I want representative women to meet their Chief Executive and to understand the policies of the present administration. If," she added quietly, "the dear Lord will give me the strength, I want to help in this in every way I can."

THAT Mr. Harding has the same ideals of the high office of the Presidency was shown in an unexpected little incident on Easter Monday. In mid-afternoon the south lawn of the grounds were crowded with frolicking children from every rank of life, and Mrs. Harding with a party of friends watched the fun from the south porch, where the President joined them at intervals. He was busy in his office, however, when two young girls called to present to him a great chocolate Easter egg. As he glanced over his desk at the two smiling girls he invited them to bring the egg back to the White House toward evening when he would be free and when they could see the fun from the south porch.

Of course the girls were delighted and before going back to the White House one of the girls—in the wild hope of a happy opportunity—slipped her birthday book into her pocket. The happy opportunity came! The President was more than kind in his polite attention to his young guests, and was careful to see that they met Mrs. Harding and the others on the porch. As they were leaving the girl with the birthday book said to him, "Mr. President, you have been so awfully good to us—I wonder if I dare to ask you if you will write your name in my birthday book?"

"You bet I will!" answered the President laughingly as he reached for the book. He took the little volume in his hands and turned the pages rapidly to the one for November 2. As he glanced down at it his face suddenly sobered and for a long instant his eyes were fastened on the Bible verse at the top of the page. Then without a word he quietly wrote his name and closed the book as he handed it back.

As soon as the girls had left the White House grounds they scanned the book eagerly to find his name and to see what the verse could be which had so sobered their genial host. Here are the words from the Ninety-first Psalm which headed the page for November 2 and underneath which President Harding had written his name: "I will set him on high, because he hath known my name."

A Church Built in Spare Hours

By
MARSHALL DON BEUICK

THE form of church structures nowadays ordinarily is conceived in a bustling office amid the rustling of tracing cloth and the rattling of blueprints. Elders, deacons or trustees, suspicious of architects who prate about Norman styles or places of worship with a Byzantine touch, sit in the office and look over black and white plan drawings and decide what the new church shall look like, and later inform the congregation, which accepts the verdict and awaits the completion of its spiritual home.

The Rev. P. J. O. Cornell of the Swedish Evangelical Lutheran Emanuel Church of South Manchester, Conn., ignored the usual procedure of erecting a church. He took the congregation into his confidence and organized it into units for labor. Those who were handy with pick and shovel had their work allotted them and others who understood masonry, plastering or carpentry were assigned to the building of the foundation and the construction of the walls and wood work of the church, which the practical minister has designed.

The Swedish section of this Connecticut mill town is a medieval community in its religious life. The church compares, in the idea at its foundation, with the cathedrals built by the hands of artisans of the Middle Ages. The members of the congregation gave a certain number of spare hours for work on the structure under the direction of their spiritual shepherd. When the building is finished it will be theirs in reality—a masterpiece of modern community activity.

This is not Dr. Cornell's first experience in church construction. He came, not as a novice, to South Manchester to perform an experiment, but as a tried church architect. In Braddock, Pennsylvania, he organized his Swedish Lutheran community and built a church after the medieval practice.

"The first year," Dr. Cornell said in his practical way, "we excavated and laid the foundation. The next year, 1915, we finished the basement work. There were every Saturday from twenty-five to thirty-six men working, and we hired a concrete mixer and a young man to run it. We had the sand and gravel on the property, and we got about one hundred loads of stones to put in the concrete walls.

"The pastor has been the architect. In the building has been used for face brick eighty-two thousand manganese bricks, and one hundred and seventy inside red brick. As we did not know the size of the brick, the drawing was made so that the bricklayers did not have to cut the brick.

"As most of our people are working in a silk factory and are not used to such hard work as concrete, they are worthy, we think, of our praise for the many days of hard work. If the members had not been willing to work so hard, we could not be able to build such a substantial church. All unnecessary ornaments have been left out as it costs too much money, and yet we have tried to keep the Gothic idea both in the exterior and in the interior. It has been a costly work, but we have kept expenses down."

THE work on the church began in May, 1914. It took the congregation a year to excavate the cellar and lay the foundation, by Saturday afternoon work. The women lent their aid at cook stoves where they made coffee and prepared substantial foods for the manual workers. By 1916 the upper part of the church was completed, but the war interrupted the work, compelling the members to use the church basement for services. Money was obtained with difficulty at this time. Mothers and fathers were sending their sons to war, and supporting them with contributions for war service organizations. Dr. Cornell bade farewell to his two sons and never saw them again in the merry group who toiled at church building each Saturday. They lie in France near other churches built by the members of the old town guilds.

It was at the annual meeting of the congregation in 1913 that Dr. Cornell introduced his plan for the erection of a church by the manual efforts of the congregation. The members met the proposition by electing a committee of seven persons to organize the work and prepare suggestions for architectural styles. The committee has a medieval, craft-guild character. The pastor-architect is the chairman, two others are carpenters, a concrete worker, a bricklayer, a painter, and a business man are the other members.

Questions and Answers

ES. B., Los Angeles, Calif. 1. "Grace" is subject to various interpretations. In the spiritual sense, it is divine favor or condescension to mankind, individually or collectively. In the concrete Gospel sense, it is the unmerited love and favor of God in Christ, as shown in the salvation freely provided for mankind (Eph. 2:9). It is also described as the Divine influence acting within the heart, regenerating, sanctifying and keeping it. Grace brings us the peace and joy of assurance. It has been described as "the life of the soul, as the soul is the life of the body." It has been also defined as the nobility and purity of character which come from holy living, nearness to God, constant submission of our will to His will, and putting our whole life into His keeping. 2. In the parable of the "pearl of great price" (Matthew 13:45, 46) it is to be noted that the pearl, instead of being found by accident, is discovered by one who made it his business to seek for such treasures, and whose best efforts were put forth to find greater and still more precious treasures than he had done in the past. No expenditure of time, means and effort was spared, no hardship or self-denial avoided. He searched, confident that the best of his discoveries was yet to come, the way ready, if need be, to sacrifice his all that he might possess it. So in the spiritual application of the parable, the searcher who has already learned to love and appreciate the blessings of the Kingdom, is stirred in his soul to strive toward the attainment of still higher and greater blessing. He devotes all of his energies and his means, and consecrates his life to this single task. Unlike others, who make the search for the highest a side issue, he makes it his whole business. And his faith is rewarded, for he finds something that exceeded all his expectations, and which he values beyond all computation.

H. W. W., East Bernard, Texas. There are many writers who have discussed the "Lost Tribes," but none have had sufficient data to deal with the subject authoritatively. All that has been printed on the subject, while interesting, is still little more than mere speculation. No reliable information is available.

Reader. The fundamental religion of Japan is Shintoism ("the way of the gods") and it is affiliated with ancestor worship, as in China. The throne is venerated and the royal ancestors are worshipped. In late years, this ancient religion is reported as declining, due doubtless to national progress in education and the spread of Christianity. Shintoism has few public services and these are usually quite simple. There are many famous shrines to which frequent pilgrimages are made. It is estimated that there are 25,000,000 Shintoists in Asia (chiefly in Japan), 2,000 in Africa and 6,000 in Central and South America and 6,000 in Australia.

W. F. Bryant, for over fifteen years a faithful mountain missionary in Tennessee, writes to the Mail-Bag: "I was holding a revival meeting 125 miles from my home. The meeting had been going on two weeks. On Monday, July 18, I received a telegram that my home was burned down from the explosion of an oil stove. I came in on the next train, and found that it was so." He found even the bed covering burned up. He carried only a small insurance, and is now in a very trying position. Some of his family saved nothing from the fire but a pair of overalls and a shirt. We would ask our readers to help this brave worker to re-establish himself in his home. A few hundred dollars would do it. Send your gift, whatever you feel you can afford, to the Christian Herald for the "Homeless Missionary," and the money will be forwarded and duly acknowledged. And don't forget that "who so gives quickly gives twice."

Arthur Tooley, Brockport, N. Y., writes: "Between thirty and forty years ago, a poem was recited as part of the rhetorical exercises of our Normal School, entitled 'The Dandy Fifth.' In brief and very crudely stated, the incident covered by the poem was as follows:

A grizzled veteran of the Civil War was observed to lift his hat in salute of a much younger man, dressed in the height of fashion. The marked deference of the salute excited the curiosity of a bystander and he inquired the reason. The veteran replied that in his division there was a regiment composed of young 'swells,' whose chief aim in life seemed to be dress and manners. So marked was this characteristic that they were called disdainfully 'the Dandy Fifth.' A great battle ensued. 'The Dandy Fifth' occupied an important part of the line. They fought like demons, and such were their exploits that while they were still called 'The Dandy Fifth,' the note of contempt in the designation had changed to one of respect and admiration. As he concluded his story, the veteran said he always took off his hat when he met a member of 'The Dandy Fifth.' I would like to know the name of the author of the poem and if possible to get a copy of it."

Reader, Lodi, Wis., writes: "My heart aches when I glance over the newspapers of today and I ask: How can the mothers raise true, honest boys whose minds are fed on the details of the murders, divorces, robberies and all that is evil, printed with enticing headline, but not one word about any good that is being done? 2. Again, as to the Armenian question, would it not be better to bring them to America or Canada, than to leave them to the mercy of the awful Turks?"

1. There are, fortunately, newspapers that do not gloat over the repulsive details of crime, and which are not a menace to youth. Careful parents should see that these are selected and the sensational publications excluded from the home. 2. Under our new law regulating immigration, each nationality is allowed to send its due proportion and Armenia's would be comparatively small. There are brighter days in store for that unhappy country, however, if one may judge from the waning power of Turkey in the near East.

F. B., Salem, O., writes: "The enclosed verses were given me by an old man, who said he learned them so long ago he doesn't know now where he got them. Are they not worth printing in the Christian Herald? It seems to me the children should be better acquainted with the Bible than they are in these days."

"Oh, to be able to voice my faith"

—cry those whose tongues are halted by a too meager knowledge of God's Holy Word.

How many times you have longed to rise in prayer meeting, or a young people's society meeting, and pour out the praises that filled your heart, or tell of the blessing you had found in some Scripture passage—yet have remained silent in your seat! How many times you have thirsted to share the very depths of your soul—yet lack of words made expression too difficult. Your starved knowledge of Scripture truth, your slender grasp of the Divine Revelation, make you timid to speak out in the presence of others who have studied the Bible diligently.

Surely, you are not measuring up to the standard of a true Christian worker if your heart and mind are not well stored with the knowledge of God's Word.

All true Christians—whether business men, housewives, office workers, Sunday School teachers or preachers realize that by personal conversation as well as by their conduct they should bear witness in their daily contact with others. And they crave fuller knowledge and greater readiness to do it. Through

How would you feel and act if you were suddenly to be told that you had come into a big fortune over night? From an income of $125 a month, to cutting coupons on $10,000,000 worth of gilt-edged securities is a change so radical that it would turn most men's heads—to say nothing of their wives and daughters. Just what happened is vividly told in Dr. Sheldon's dramatic presentation. At no time in a man's life is there a stronger test of character than when Fortune knocks at the door. Some lose their bearings altogether. Read the book and see how Anson Howard and his folks stood the test. This is the latest book from the pen of Dr. Sheldon and is sure to reach a wide audience. ## A Declaration for Peace

Clergymen and Laymen Join with Christian Herald in Bringing Problem of Armament Before the Churches of the United States

THE approach of the Disarmament Conference now called officially by President Harding to meet in Washington on November 11th, emphasizes the necessity of the Christian Church recording itself unmistakably on the question of world Peace. As we said in our editorial columns recently, "Never was there such an opportunity as now for the Church—and that means every denomination—to throw the weight of its influence and its utterance on the scales and let the world see where it stands on this greatest question of all times. The united voice of the churches of America will aid materially in forwarding the great work in which this nation has taken the leading stand."

The Christian Herald, feeling keenly that some way should be found by which this voice could be adequately heard, has asked a large group of prominent clergymen and laymen to comprise a committee which shall present to all the churches a resolution (to be found elsewhere on this page) for the signature of the pastor and church officials as representatives of the membership. In taking this step there is no thought of duplicating efforts already under way for obtaining an expression of religious opinion through the medium of other agencies, but we believe such a movement will very strongly supplement and reinforce whatever else is done along these lines. And in so doing the judgment of the Christian people of the country will be made doubly felt in the councils of the Powers as they meet in conference.

For the last seven years, the Church has been very severely criticized. Criticized in the first place for its failure to prevent the great war, and in the second place for its failure to stop it once the armies were set in motion. Much of this criticism is unjustified, but there will be far less justification if the Church does not take a determined stand now to limit the possibilities of future wars by every means in its power. One of the first means at hand is to express in unmistakable terms its intention that wars shall cease from now on, and that as a first step to this world status, that the Powers shall agree to a limitation of armament, and to an actual settlement of questions in dispute and find a method by which future problems shall be solved amicably through discussion or arbitration.

named to sit in the conference of the Powers, but it can be heard, and in such volume that it cannot be disregarded, by the representatives of England, France, Italy, Japan and China. Conceivably, the energy with which this body speaks might control the results of the deliberations. No body of diplomats would feel able to resist a unanimous command from such a group representing the most solid, substantial and influential type of American citizenry.

The peoples of other nations are speaking now to their governments and to the men who will represent them in Washington. The voices of peace and good-will are heard in ever-increasing volume from the Far East to the English Channel. Americans will want to join their demands to those from the rest of the world and emphasize in every possible way the sentiment that controls the United States.

It is in this firm belief that the Christian Herald undertakes to bring before the churches of the country the necessity of immediate action on the question of disarmament, and urges on them two courses: First, that the pastor and church board sign as representing their congregation the resolution presented herewith. Second, that Sunday, November 6th, be set aside as a day on which disarmament and World Peace shall have first place in all the services.

The resolutions, on their receipt at the Bible House, will be carefully tabulated and filed for presentation at Washington before the first session of the Disarmament Conference. The larger the endorsements in number of churches, the more weight the presentation will have on the personnel of the conference, both American and foreign. May we suggest that steps be taken immediately to obtain the action, formally, or informally, of your congregation so that your pastor and church board may be authorized to sign the resolution and promptly return it to us. The names and locations of churches subscribing to the resolution will be published in the columns of the Christian Herald.

One Family's Girl Problem

THIS problem is not going to be what you think. In all probability, if you have been interested so far in the various problems which have been stated as part of an average American family, you will perhaps think of the Girl Problem in some such way as this:

Average Girl as to looks, behavior, intelligence, and conversation. Gives her family considerable concern on account of her demands for expensive dress, her abnormal love of amusements, or her slangy familiarity with young men. If not those things, what are the problems of American girls? Some of the girls, you who are reading this article, do present such problems to their parents, don't they? Or, if the problems are not any of these, perhaps they are even more serious, and involve falling in love with the wrong young man, or wasting precious time in frivolous pursuits, or failing in a proper knowledge of a young woman's place in the home, or letting mother do the heavy housework in the kitchen while the piano plays jazz music in the parlor.

I remember a few nights ago my wife and I were talking with our next-door neighbors about their children, and the neighbor's wife was much concerned about their girl, who was losing her interest in all religious things, didn't want to go to Sunday school or church, and was very critical of the sermons she heard. They were troubled, both father and mother, over some remarks that had come to them from some church people, who had observed that their girl was irreverent during church service and annoyed other people by giggling and whispering, so much so that she had to be spoken to by the people who were sitting near by.

IT WILL give you some hint, perhaps, of the kind of Girl ours is when I say that after coming home from this neighbor's I said to my wife: "We think sometimes we have troubles over our children, but just suppose we faced the things our neighbors face! After all, the Girl—"

"Yes," said my wife, "the Girl—"

We call her "the Girl," because there is only one, but you may want to know her real name, and it is just Mary. I don't know a better name, and all girls who have it, will, I hope, agree with me.

Well, we are not getting on very fast with the Girl Problem, and one reason is that I am a little reluctant to tell about it. When I am through, you will perhaps understand better, why.

If I could illustrate this article I would put in a photograph of the Girl, so that you could get some sort of a notion as to how she looks. You might not call her pretty, but you would have to call her good-looking—and wide-awake, and healthy, and happy. I think I never knew a happier person. And the more I think of it, the more I am compelled to believe that real happiness does not depend on amusements. Because, the Girl is not dependent on—well, let the following incident which occurred the other morning at the breakfast table, give you some idea of the Girl Problem in our home.

It was nearing the close of the High School term and the younger boy was hinting at some extra expenses in connection with a function known as the Hyperion Prom. The Hyperion Prom. is an annual affair, and means flowers and dances and refreshments for the High School literary and scientific societies.

I handed over the money the boy suggested he needed, and then looked at the Girl.

She laughed. "I have paid for my share of the refreshments, father," she said, and she looked so provokingly happy over it that I said, "Mary, I wish you would lend me some money. You always seem to have some."

"She helps Miss Thompson in the cafeteria," said the younger boy. It was the first I had known of it, and at first I felt a little annoyed. Because although I often orated before the assembled family on the nobility of physical labor, somehow it didn't seem just the thing to have one of my own children doing hard, dirty, hot work in a kitchen to earn spending money.

BUT the Girl looked so happy and contented that all I had the heart to say was, "How much have you earned that way?"

"Thirty-five dollars this term," she said. "And let me tell you, father, I am learning to make the best pie. Why don't you come in to the cafeteria some day, and try our menu? You know the general public can come in after twelve-thirty, after the students are served."

"Well, I will. I generally go to the Chamber of Commerce and have to get there at noon in order to get a seat. But save me a slice of your best pie and I'll come over some day. I don't like the idea of your working in that hot kitchen this weather. You know you don't need to."

"But I like it. And I like to wait on the tables. It's fun. And if you want to borrow some money, father, I can lend you ten or even twenty dollars if that will help you out."

"Thank you," I said. "Put it into a new dress to wear at the Prom."

"Much obliged," she said. "But I have other plans for the money if you don't want it."

She came around to my chair and with a laugh rumbled up my hair, what I have left, and kissed me good-bye as she and her brother started off to school. And then she ran around to her mother and kissed her, and hugged the older Boy and ran out.

AS THE door closed, the college Boy said, "Father, did you know that Mary is going to spend that money she has earned working in that hot cafeteria to help provide a rest room for the colored girls in the High School?"

"No!" I exclaimed. "Who put that into her head?"

"She did. She says that these girls are neglected by all the other girls, and that they have no place where they feel welcome at the recess periods. Mary is starting a lot of trouble."

"But," says my wife, "her motive is simply a real honest desire to help those girls. We can't discourage that sort of thing. There is too much of the other sort of action going on already."

"She is a queer girl," I said scratching my head, that part of it where the hair is not in the way. "She does not care for dances or movies or expensive dresses or any thing else that most girls are crazy for nowadays."

"But it's awful funny, Dad," said the Boy. "She goes to the dances and never dances herself and she is the most popular girl in the room. And when it comes to scholarship, she has them all going. Did you see Mary's last report, Mother?"

Mother nodded, with something very much like a smile smothered in tears, proud and at the same time puzzled, as, I am frank to say, I was.

"Well, I don't see how she does it. Do you?" I said to my wife. "How can a girl nowadays keep so happy and contented and overflowing with spirits as our Mary, when she does not do what most girls do? It looks kind of spooky to me."

"But she told me the other day that she is not the only girl who does not care to dance or spend her money foolishly. She said that there were more than fifty girls in our High School who do not dance. So she is not so peculiar, after all. She has plenty of good company."

"Do you mean to tell me," I said, astounded, "that there are fifty girls in this town who do not care for dancing?"

"That is what Mary says. But she wouldn't care for it even if she was entirely alone. And she would be just as popular. But I know that her example has had a wonderful influence over very many girls in the school. She belongs to the class of girls that make women like Jane Addams and Mary Antin."

"Or Joan of Arc," I whispered. "Just think of having a girl like Joan in this family! If she is going to fight the battles of the world for the oppressed as she is doing for these High School girls—"

I didn't finish the sentence, for I did not know how. My wife's eyes were shining. "Mary is very human. She is not a Joan of Arc. She is an American girl, blessed with great good health, common sense, love of hard work, joy in doing for others and so much vitality that she does not miss the ordinary forms of common amusement current among most young people. And the fact that she retains the respect and good-will of all her schoolmates is due to the fact that they recognize honest convictions when they are free from hypocrisy. We ought to be proud of our Mary."

AFTER the college Boy had gone out I said to my wife: "Do you know, I wonder sometimes what will happen when Mary falls in love with someone. I can't think of a single young man in this town who is good enough for her. Where do you think we can find such a man? What will she do? There isn't a young fellow out at the college who can compare with her. It seems too bad to think she will probably have to grow up an old maid."

My wife laughed. She often smiles, but her laugh is comparatively rare. Mary has the same, rollicking, infectious, lilting rhythm.

"Do you know," she said. "That is one of the things that never worries me. I have the most perfect faith that some time Mary will have a happy home of her own. I am absolutely without any anxiety about it. And as for no young men being good enough for the Girl, I wonder how all the good girls like ours do manage somehow to get such good young men for husbands. The world does contain some fine young men, even fit for such fine young women as ours."

I looked across the table at my wife, and something in her eyes made me wonder if possibly she was suggesting that even a mere man like the one across the table from her, with all his faults, did have some real values. I waived her a kiss, and when I had gone on down to my store I couldn't get rid of the thought that the different problems of my home at different times have given me. And as I went over the fact of the Girl in her happy, healthy, and normal development, and of the great prospect she has of a wonderful and useful life which did not depend for its power on the superficial things, I came more and more to the conclusion that all along the one greatest influence in the Girl's life, and in the lives of all our children, could be traced to the wonderful example of their mother.

For that very night as I came quietly down out of my den in the upper story of the house, I saw my wife, as I looked through the half-open door of our room, kneeling at her accustomed favorite place by her writing-table, and I knew that as her custom was, she was praying for her children and the blessing of the Master on our home. And in all humility, I trust, I joined my prayers with hers, in thanksgiving for our Home, and in an earnest petition that I might be a worthier father and husband, in solving all family problems, which I began to understand in my slow man fashion were being already solved, by the prayers of a good mother, prayers said out of the heart long before the children were born.

Where Back Yards Are Quaint

OF ALL quaint places, the tight little island of Nantucket, lying off the mainland of Massachusetts, certainly takes the palm. The streets, houses, natives and customs are delightfully odd. Even the back yards are unusual and different from those you see elsewhere, having a charm all their own. Here is a picture of one of these back yards. The Nantucketers are a seafaring people, for if they were not they could never get away from their island home, and years ago they were prominent in the whaling industry. The traditions of the sea, therefore, are the birthright of Nantucketers and are strongly in evidence everywhere. Consequently it is not surprising that in this particular back yard there should be a boat or two, and a discarded ship's capstan, in the center, and an old carriage thrown in for good measure. And the odd thing about some of these back yards is that they never change from year to year, but you may see the same conglomeration of traps in them, one summer after another.

Christian Team-Work in a University

How the Religious Needs of the Students Are Met at Cornell

By EVANS A. WORTHLEY

THE United Christian Work at Cornell University involves the co-ordination of five denominations in their approach to the life of the student body. This united work is known as the Cornell University Christian Association, so far as the work is related to the men of the University. Barnes Hall, a building that had its beginning in the active Christian life of John R. Mott when he was a student at Cornell, is the headquarters of the work.

The first floor of this building, which until last year was little used, has been converted into a very popular Coffee House and Lounge. By reason of its strategic location upon the Campus and the open-door policy of the Association, whose home it is, it is rapidly becoming the democratic center of University life. More than forty-five organizations now hold their meetings there. The following list reveals the widely varying character of the activities which center there:

The Adirondack Club
Americanization Class
Baltimore Polytechnic Club
Bible Class on Hebrew Prophets
Boy Scout Leaders
Chess Club
Chemistry Association
Chinese Bible Class
Chinese Club
Christian Science Society
Class Meetings—Freshmen, Sophomores, etc.
Country Problems Group
Current Events Forum
Culver Club
Debate Club
Eighty-six Memorial
English Instructors' Get-Together
Era Board
Ethics Club
Foreign Student Groups
Friends' Society
Glee Club
Graduate Students' Club
History Instructors
Independent Association
Inter-fraternity Association
Jewish Congregation
Masonic Club
Masque

Many of these groups unite both faculty and students for discussion around the tables in the Cornell Coffee House. This—the Coffee House—is the most distinctive new thing at Barnes Hall—not a cafeteria, not a restaurant, not a boarding-house, but a brand new feature in Cornell life; a "hang-out" for men, where they can sit around and talk things over, and where hot "ham slams," toasted hot ham rolls, doughnuts, coffee, etc., are sold at reasonable prices. The Coffee House is operated as an open club for students, faculty and alumni entirely without membership fees. Funds to complete the transformation of the building into a fine student center are being sought.

THE inauguration of this Christian enterprise and its development are largely due to the vision of the "correlating executive," as he frequently calls himself, R. H. Edwards, Yale '01. He began his career as Christian Association Secretary at Yale and later was Congregational University pastor at the University of Wisconsin. Later he spent several years with the International Committee of the Y. M. C. A. as Social Service Secretary. He brought to the task the constructive vision which had been developed by prolonged observation and first-hand acquaintance with the great University centers.

The one condition of his coming involved securing the co-operation of various churches through approval and support of the National Secretaries of the Boards of Education of the leading denominations. After several conferences, the Secretaries of the Baptist, Congregational, Episcopal, Methodist and Presbyterian Boards united in joint approval of the plan. Then, as rapidly as they could be secured, these five denomi-had been in charge of Washington Inn in London during the war, was persuaded to come to Cornell. Here, among the boys of a great University, she has much the same opportunity to wield the magnetic influence which she so wonderfully manifested in the American "Y" center for officers in London. At Cornell she is in charge of the Coffee House and also represents the University in charge of the Employment Bureau, where she comes into touch with the boys who are working their way through the University.

The pastors and laymen in the city churches are completely and cordially supporting the plan. They appreciate the limited time which students have at their disposal, and realize that registration in Bible classes and church attendance represents but a partial measurement of the value of this work. The personal contacts which are established, in and out of season, upon the campus and off of it, are the continuing and cumulating contribution which largely determines the point of view a student has when he leaves the University.

The churches are confident that the men in this work begin and end their program in the Christian Church. By uniting into one common emphasis the work of the campus and of the city churches, a feeling of unity is created which is wholesome in every way.

The students cease to put one over against the other, as heretofore. They quickly come to realize that it is all one program. The significance of having such an illustration of unity and co-operation manifested upon the campus of a great university is obvious.

THIS United Work at Cornell is now two years old, and there is no longer any question as to its permanence at Cornell. Residences are being obtained for the staff, an undertaking which involves an expenditure of $72,000 for the purchase and upkeep of the six houses. Such residences make possible informal social gatherings and supply the intimate personal touch with home life so highly appreciated in a community of five thousand young people away from their own homes. In addition, this ownership of property serves to stabilize and make permanent the work. Each residence for a church representative will become the property of his church organization, that for the C. U. C. A. executive the property of the Board of Directors.

Plans are gradually maturing for a School of Religion where, in due time, it is hoped credit courses can be offered to students. Beyond doubt the future will reveal that a Christian student enterprise is developing at Cornell which will have great significance to the student life of the nation.

In a recent communication, Dr. Albert W. Smith, Acting President of the University, expressed his appreciation of the work in the following manner:

"I wish to express my appreciation and approval of the new plan for carrying forward the work of the Cornell University Christian Association. There is evidence of clear thinking about the life problems of students.

"It is often said that the chief function of a University is the training of the intellect. This is true; but it is also true that mental development is not the greatest thing for which young men and women go to the Universities. They go to prepare for life work; and in this, character building is more important than mental discipline. With the present organization the Association should become a very important aid to the University in character building."

To this may well be added the words of a distinguished Christian leader, recently returned from Japan, after reviewing the Cornell work: "This is the most hopeful thing I have seen in America. This is the sort of thing that is needed in all the large Universities and the method of organization is most suggestive for Christian Associations everywhere."

nations appointed University Pastors, each of whom was also to be responsible for one special phase of the United Work. The following are at present upon the Staff, aside from Mr. Edwards: John D. W. Fetter, Baptist University pastor, director of Church Relations; Cyril Harris, Episcopalian University pastor, director of Devotional Service; James A. G. Moore, Congregational University pastor, director of Extension Service; Hugh A. Moran, Presbyterian University pastor, director of Religious Education; Evans A. Worthley, Methodist Episcopal University pastor, director of Vocational Counsel.

The above departments are conducted through undergraduate committees. The Committee on Church Relations endeavors to get in touch with the students when they arrive in the fall. The welcome of campus and city is united into one emphasis through the open-house parties at Barnes Hall and the receptions in the city churches. In the same manner the opportunities for religious education are presented to the students. The courses that are offered by the churches are given first consideration. When these classes are well under way, other courses are started in Barnes Hall and various fraternities. The department of Extension Service, under the direction of Mr. Moore, arranged for the entertainment of two thousand New York State boys at the Older Boys' Conference last November. Men are helped in their life-work problems and are directed into various channels of service by the Department of Vocational Counsel. The Devotional Service renders an especially valuable contribution by correlating the programs and activities of various church Young People's Societies and other devotional meetings.

An interesting departure was made by securing a hostess for Barnes Hall. Miss May Peabody, who

IN view of widespread discussion regarding the effects of the student's religious life of his years in college or university, this presentation of the work done at Cornell University in keeping the student in touch with church activities is of unusual interest. Cornell's achievements along this line may not be exactly typical, but what has been done there furnishes an excellent "sample" of the way in which American educators and religious workers are meeting the needs of the students in our institutions of higher learning. Mr. Worthley, as Methodist Episcopal University pastor and director of Vocational Counsel, is an active participant in this service at Cornell.

A Story of a City Church

The hush that followed was ended by a voice, clear and strong, sweetly solemn in intonation

CHAPTER I

"A MAN like that is wasted upon a country town!"

The speaker was one of a group collected upon a vine-draped veranda in the early afternoon of a perfect September Sunday. A band of green velvet lawn lay between the house and a spacious kitchen garden. Beyond the garden was a thrifty orchard stretching down a gentle slope to a back-street and an irregular outline of factory buildings. Peace and plenty were the features of the scene and hour.

The early Sunday dinner was over, and Robert Lawson, the proprietor of home and factory, had "nothing upon his mind," as he would have phrased it, for the remaining hours of the one rest-day of the week. His comely wife and her aged mother and the visitor for the day made up the quartet.

Silas Ford, the senior member of the well-known firm of Ford and Talbot, New York City, had run up from the city on Saturday, having a business engagement with the mill-owner, and for the first time in an acquaintanceship of ten years had accepted an invitation to spend Sunday under the hospitable roof. He was rising fifty years in age, well set-up in figure, as became his residence and profession, and his hostess, who had a lively sense of humor, had confided to her most intimate friend, her pastor's wife, that she had dubbed him "John Gilpin" to herself.

"I am always reminded of the 'citizen of credit and renown,'" she declared. "He looks the part to perfection. In his most genial moods he positively exudes prosperity!"

He was more than genial today. He was benignly patronizing in commenting upon the religious service he had attended that morning.

"I was not surprised at the size of the congregation after hearing the sermon. It was a treat from first to last. And I don't mind saying here among friends that it was all the more delightful because I am not fed with that kind of spiritual food as a rule. I make it a point of conscience to attend church regularly when I am at home.

It wouldn't cost me an effort if I heard such preaching as that every Sunday. A man like that is wasted upon a country town."

Robert Lawson demurred politely: "Don't disparage the country audience, please! Mr. Haile hasn't preached here for ten years without attracting people who can appreciate intellect and education—"

"Don't fail to add 'and such practical Christianity as was inculcated today!'" interrupted the hostess. "Mr. Haile is very eloquent at times and some of his sermons prove him to be a fine scholar. I think I like him best when he deals with the everyday life of the Christian. I feel then that I bring away a lesson for everyday living."

"You are right, my daughter!" assented the mother. "I am very sorry I was not well enough to hear him today. You see, Mr. Ford, he is preaching a series of sermons upon the Lord's Prayer. It is too bad that it was necessary for me to miss one."

MRS. LAWSON laid her hand upon the thin fingers resting upon the arm of her mother's chair. "If I had known, dear, that you would not be able to get downstairs to your telephone this forenoon, I would have taken my pencil and pad to church with me and brought you something worth hearing."

She gave a pleasant little laugh: "One thing Mr. Haile said I have laid to heart with the firm persuasion that it was a special message to me. He said that we have a way of complaining of the monotony of daily tasks. We keep up the treadmill round, crying out all the time against the 'everlasting grind,' that hinders us from doing better things. Our preacher compared this sort of work to marking time in the army. We watch a company of well-drilled and well-equipped soldiers standing in line for minutes at a time, ready and eager, as it were, to spring into action, yet idle but for the regular, apparently meaningless play of the lower limbs. The veteran marks time as if it were the most important business of the day. And, all the while he is on the alert for the 'Forward March!' that must surely come at the right moment."

She arose hastily as the half-clock struck the half-hour. "There is my call to the field! It is time the children and I were off to Sunday school."

Mr. Ford turned to Mrs. Wells as Mrs. Lawson disappeared into the house. "Excuse me, Madam! but your daughter alluded to your telephone. Have you direct connection with the church?"

"Thanks to this dear boy here!" The old lady nodded gratefully toward her son-in-law. "A year ago, when my rheumatism took fast hold of me, he had a private wire attached to the pulpit and connected with a telephone instrument in the sitting-room so that I could sit at my ease on stormy Sundays and enjoy church services. I can't tell you what a blessed privilege it is—I think all the time of a little sanctuary."

The visitor was interested.

"It really works well?"

"Perfectly! I wish you could try it. And—" with a little laugh—"as my daughter and I are sometimes detailed at home by weather or illness the blessed old fellow had another receiver put in. It reminds one of the promise 'Where two or three are gathered together in My name.'"

There was a diffident cadence in the voice that sank lower with the last words, as is the way with many pious souls when personal religion is the topic.

Mr. Ford was in full sympathy with her. He put out his hand to touch hers: "I understand! Thank you!"

After a long minute he spoke and he, too, was diffident: "Would it be a great imposition upon you if I asked permission to stay at home with you this evening and have a part in the little service? The experience will be a novelty."

After receiving the delighted assurance that his presence would be welcome, he had another story to hear:

"There is a poor woman belonging to our church who has not walked a step for twenty years," narrated Robert Lawson. "After we had made the successful experiment of bringing Mother into communication with the church, Mrs. Haile brought before the Ladies' Aid Association the notion of doing the same for poor Mrs. Bates. I wish you could know the happiness it has carried to that afflicted creature! That was like Mrs. Haile. 'She was cut out for a pastor's helpmeet if ever there was one made for the office.'"

A facetious fellow-official in the large and flourishing Banner Church of New York had said of Silas Ford that he was "incorrigibly addicted to church-going." He had been a commercial traveler in early life and still made extensive tours of his many fields of operation, but he never failed to attend divine worship on Sunday. By the time of which we write he would have called himself "a connoisseur in pulpit oratory," if he had known the meaning of the French word.

THUS it came about that he had that Sabbath evening what he was wont to allude to in after years as a unique experience he could never forget.

The moon was at the full and the air so still that the shadows of the streamers of the giant weeping willow in front of the house might have been drawn with a black pencil upon the smooth turf, so sharp and straight were they. The sitting-room was in a wing of the Lawson dwelling, separated from the street by a broad lawn. Long parallelograms of moonlight lay upon the matted floor below and beyond two unshuttered windows. The only artificial light in the room fell from a shaded burner upon the stand set in the middle of the room. Above this depended the telephone wires terminating in two telephone receivers. A Bible and a hymn-book were at each end of the stand, which was draped with white.

FOREWORD

FORTY years ago I resolved that should life and health be spared, I would, in the fullness of time, write this book. Obedience to the self-imposed task has been a painful and arduous duty.

If, as I had reason to believe, a malignant growth is sapping the strength of certain branches of the Church Universal, the scalpel in my unskilled hand cannot remove the foul thing. Yet is not knowledge of the existence and nature of the evil a preliminary curative step? And have not long training and circumstance indicated me as an agent in the work?

Fifty years' experience as a pastor's wife, and sixty years as a Bible-class leader (than which no more blessed task was ever laid to my hand!), to say nothing of active labor in various charitable and religious organizations, must have qualified me to some extent for the formidable undertaking. At least all this should protect me from suspicions of disloyalty to the Mother whose welfare is as dear to me as my own life.

One point I would guard with jealous care. While events, incidents and even language reported in the course of my story are absolutely authentic, the actors I have employed are mere puppets made and used for the occasion and the time. In homely phrase, there are no "take-offs" or "snap-shots" from life in these pages. I am neither lampoonist nor caricaturist. From the beginning to the end of what has been, if a sorrowful task, yet a labor of love, I have had but one object in view: That is the desire and the hope that I may be in some measure the humble instrument of awakening "those who are at ease in Zion" to a just and devout perception of the standard set as "a mark of their high calling" by the inspired writer who was the kinsman as well as the disciple of the Master: "Pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father is this—to visit the fatherless and widow in their affliction and to keep himself unspotted from the world." "Altogether," as Silas told his wife next day, "the place was more like a private chapel than an ordinary parlor. The very atmosphere seemed consecrated."

The sacred awe was upon him by the time he took the chair designated as his by a silent wave of his companion's hand. She took that at the other end of the stand and by a mutual impulse they bowed their heads upon their hands in silent prayer before adjusting the instruments to their ears, as the last chime of the church-bell died away.

The organ-prelude came to Ford's ear so clearly that he was almost startled into an exclamation. The church was a quarter of a mile off. The organ might have been in the next room. Then a dreamy, tenderly sweet musical movement arose and flowered as it were, into the immortal Old Hundred Doxology. Again by silent consent, the two worshippers joined in the singing.

The thin, sweet soprano of the old woman was upborne by a bass that would have been strident had not a courteous impulse subdued it measurably. The conduct of the wires was so perfect that the rustle of the congregation in rising and in resuming seats was plainly heard by the distant participants in the service.

The hush that followed was ended by a voice clear and strong, sweetly solemn in intonation:

"Let us invoke the presence and blessing of our Almighty and All-merciful Father in Heaven!"

THE Lawsons had told their guest that the second sermon of the day was rather a lecture than a discourse," and the general character of the service more social and informal than those of the forenoon. It seemed, then, but natural that the voice, which brought the persuasion to the unimaginative man of a Real Presence close beside him, should use a gentle, colloquial, yet dignified tone, in reading the Parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus.

Then—"The subject of our talk this evening is contained in one word of the narrative we have just read 'Remember!' You recall the context? 'And Abraham said unto him—'Son! Remember!'"

"We have no reason to believe that this rich man whom tradition—not Scripture—has taught us to call 'Dives,' was wicked above the rank and file of his generation. He was probably a respected citizen. We hear nothing of cruelty to the weak, or dishonesty or oppression. He probably kept open house for other rich and fashionable folk, paid his servants high wages and comported himself courteously in public and in private life. It is likely that in the death-hour, he had no misgivings as to what was to come next. Abraham opened his eyes to the awful truth that he had sinned against God and man by living for himself without regard to the wants of his fellow-creatures. The patriarch did not go into particulars. In a few strong words he reminded him that while he fared sumptuously every day, he had never a thought for the diseased beggar starving at his gates without kindred or friend, or any pity except from the stray street curs who licked his sores. Dives must have passed the beggar once and again. Indeed we have reason to think that he knew of his condition.

"I once heard an illiterate man say that Dives 'fared presumptuously' every day. People laughed at the blunder. I wondered within myself if he might not put the case more properly than the common translation. Dives presumed upon the justice of his Maker in taking all the goods of life to himself and shutting the doors of his house and heart against the woes of others. He was presumptuous in assuming that he had a born right to sit down to a table spread with rich food while Lazarus had not so much as a crust. All these things the rich man was to remember in the light of Eternity, and see them blacken by comparison with what he remembered of Lazarus. The admonition implies plainly that Dives knew of Lazarus' needs and had never troubled himself to supply them.

"In short, the accusation brought against him at the bar of Eternal Justice was of Sins of Omission rather than of open and flagrant violations of the divine law. In other words he was charged to remember what he had not done although his duty was known to him—or should have been. Ignorance of what the Catechism defines as 'what duty God requires of man,' is a sin that cannot be excused in a Christian land.

"The mysterious organism we name the brain loses nothing once committed to it. The memory of each of us may be reckoned a day-book from which records are never blotted out. We read with awe not to be expressed in words of the prophetic vision, 'I saw the dead, small and great, stand before God. And the books were opened.' Your Book of Remembrance, dear friend, and mine, filled in, day by day and hour by hour and minute by minute. And to each will be spoken the same solemn injunction—"Remember!"

"Out of our own memories shall we be condemned or acquitted at that dread Bar. No need of other witnesses. Elsewhere in God's Word we read that we shall give account of every idle word. At the thought we ask ourselves if the lightest word uttered in the most unguarded minute can be rightly esteemed as 'idle.'

"The words we speak, the look we wear
A heart may heal or break."

"Do we think of this when we wound a loving heart or break the spirit of a faithful friend by a sharp reprimand or unkind retort? We might have stooped to lift the fallen, and we stepped around him and went on our selfish way. We might have said a word for Christ to a seeking soul, and deferred it to a more convenient season. We might have given of our abundance to the poverty-ridden widow and fatherless, but our bank account is the fatter for this sin of omission. Why swell the list of opportunities neglected and needless pain inflicted? As I speak, memory is busy with us all. Conscience has been aptly called, 'The voice of God speaking in the soul of man.'"

THE voice ceased suddenly. Silas Ford had listened with his ear glued to the receiver, his elbow resting upon the stand separating him from his co-auditor, whose very presence he had forgotten under the strange spell that bound him. Not an imaginative or a sentimental man, he always maintained in speaking of that evening's experience that he was under some weird indefinable influence from the moment he caught the opening sentence of the service. Every word seemed to be addressed to him, Silas Ford, personally and pointedly.

Mrs. Wells had been an attentive auditor, but the position was not new to her, and she smiled as Ford stooped for the receiver that had fallen to the table.

"Never mind!" she whispered. "Put it on again. There is no harm done!"

Ford wiped the perspiration from his forehead in obeying.

"But I have lost something," he muttered, when the shaking hand presently restored the clamps to his ears.

For the voice was telling the story familiar to the readers of Sunday-school literature three-score-and-ten years ago of "Charlotte Elizabeth's" protégé, deaf-and-dumb "Jack," and his marvelous illustration of the cleansing Blood of Christ.

"He, too, had the figure of the 'Book of Remembrance' in his mind," went on the voice. "For he sketched a long catalogue of sins upon a sheet of paper. A dark and formidable list with the repentant sinner's signature below. The Hand pierced in the palm from which blood was still dropping was passed over the sheet and nothing was left but the stain of the blood that cleanseth from all sin.

"A homely but a just figure! The pardoned sinner no more is made to possess the sins of his youth. And who of us does not appreciate the haunting horrors of such a possession? The work is gloriously complete.

"As far as the east is from the west so far hath He removed our transgressions from us." Say it over to yourself, examine it as a botanist analyzes and classifies a flower. From the eastern to the western horizon it opens the world. So far hath the Father removed from His sight the transgressions of him who has cast the burden of his iniquities, past and present, upon the Saviour of sinners. 'He will remember them no more.' Nor need you except so far as the thought will deepen your sense of what you owe to that unspeakable mercy and compassion. And there is still another use for the shameful memory. 'Remember' past sins and shortcomings when you are inclined to judge your brother harshly for having fallen into the same snares that beset and overcame you. Remember the horrible pit and the miry clay from which you were rescued; take a lesson from the infinite pity and kindness of your Master."

It was past Mrs. Wells' early bed-time when the Lawsons returned from church. A solitary figure, head bent and hands crossed at his back showed large and black upon the gravel whitened by the moonlight. It wheeled about at Mr. Lawson's hail from the gateway, and hurried to meet the pair.

"You needn't tell me a word about it!" he broke forth before they could speak. "I have had the time of my life! Never before has a message been brought straight to me—and to me alone by a voice that had no owner. And it soaked into my soul!"

CHAPTER II

MRS. HAILE never forgot the strange look upon her husband's face as she joined him in the vestibule at the conclusion of the service.

"It was not merely that he was weary and silent," she told her sister a year later. "I cannot express what startled me except by saying that he looked as if virtue had gone out of him. Not that he had preached with more energy than usual. But it came to me several times while he was speaking that he seemed to be addressing somebody beyond his congregation, so to speak. It may be a superstitious fancy, yet I have it still, recalling what happened afterward."

Like the model pastor's wife Mr. Lawson had pronounced her to be, she took her husband's arm at the church-door and they walked homeward without the exchange of a word. It was her habit established early in their married life not to converse with him on the way to or from the sanctuary. Observers of the two during the walk commented, for a while, upon their behavior, then learned to commend her tactful consideration of her husband's moods.

His habit was to fast or at best to eat very lightly before preaching. He had had a slice of bread and a # Turning Again!

TEXT—Acts 3:19. "Repent ye therefore, and turn again, that so your sins may be blotted out, that so there may come seasons of refreshing."

WHO is the speaker of these most helpful and heartening words? It is well to know the speaker, for the knowledge of the speaker frequently adds emphasis to his speech. There are some words which I would rather hear from the lips of a reclaimed drunkard than from the unpolluted lips of the archangel Gabriel. There are some evangelists which, if they were proclaimed by those who "have never, never known a fallen world like this, might almost mock us with the height and serenity of their ideal; but to hear them from one who has walked through the valley of the shadow, and triumphed even in the night, is to receive both solace and inspiration.

It is unspeakably helpful to know that the herald of my text is a man who has been bitterly familiar with "a fallen world like this," one who has stumbled again and again in the mire, and who now from the heights of a reclaimed and regenerate life, makes known his evangel to all men. "That your sins may be blotted out!" Does it not add wealth to the abundant hope to know that the speaker is one who, in an earlier day, "began to curse and swear, saying, I know not this man of whom you speak?" "That so there may come seasons of refreshing!" Again I say, does it not bring the inspiration immediately near to us to know that he, who has experienced these seasons, is one who on a dark denial day "went out and wept bitterly"? Yes, let us remember the background of the speaker's experience as we listen to his speech.

AND who are the hearers? We may gather something of the emphasis of an utterance from the kind of people, for whom it is spoken. And is it not a wonderful thing that on this particular occasion, the hearers were just those who had crucified the Lord? Now, it is certainly not an easy thing to offer a loving and encouraging word of this kind to men who have just murdered your dearest friend. I say it is not easy. To the unregenerate it is impossible. But then we must remember that these Pentecostal men and women have been spending long seasons in intercessory prayer, and they would undoubtedly pray for the violent antagonists of the Lord and for those who had played any part in His crucifixion. Their prayers had softened them and prepared them for a friendly approach to the Lord's foes. And, therefore, when the apostle came face to face with them, it was a natural and an easy thing to offer them the hope and consolation of redeeming grace.

They were, indeed, beginning "at Jerusalem!" The hardest work came first, but made easy by the indwelling power of the Spirit. We could almost have pardoned them, if they had been bitter, resentful, and hard. When Peter looked round about the crowd, he could see many a one who had been proud and ostentatious in brutal ill-treatment of the Lord. There in the crowd stood a man who had been one to spit in the Lord's face! And there, too, was another who had derided Him with loud mockings and jeers! And yet it was to these notorious people that this bold apostle offered the "unsearchable riches" of the Lord Whom they had crucified. "Repent ye, therefore, and turn again, that so your sins may be blotted out, that so there may come seasons of refreshing from the presence of the Lord."

"REPENT ye." Now, in this word there is not the slightest suggestion of tumultuous feeling. It is a perfectly dry word, in which there is no deep, hidden pool of emotion. Repentance has little or nothing to do with the upheaval of the feelings; it is concerned with the movement of a more vital part. It is well, in our time, to remember that repentance may be a perfectly dry act. I do not say that the penitent life will always remain unmoved. I rather think the time will come when the deeps will be broken up, and tears of loving regret will often fill the eyes and mingle with the light of the immortal hope.

But the initial act of repentance has nothing to do with the swell of the emotions. It is purely an act of the mind, a refurnishing of the mind, a re-direction of the mind. To repent is to change ways. The second will come spontaneously, if we attempt the first. Let a man re-furnish his mind and he will re-shape his destiny. New mental habits will be succeeded by the restoration of everything. When our mind is filled with God we shall "turn from idols," and we shall "turn from vanities," from all mere shows and appearances, as well as from the finer and viler forms of sin. He who thinks with God will most naturally walk with Him. When the "unrighteous man" has "forsaken his thoughts," the "wicked man" will "forsake his ways." When we have repented we shall "turn again."

"THAT your sins may be blotted out." Yes, this is a consolation we need. For when we have "repented" and "turned again," it does not alter the waste and ruin of our past. We are still beset by the impediment of guilt and the perilous remembrance of our own misdeeds. How we should like to live it all over again that we may live it better! Yes, and that wish will never leave us. I think that on throughout eternity, the wish may remain, and it will intensify the services of our love.

But our past need no longer follow us as a threat. It need no longer obtrude between us and God. So far as my past sin has stood between me and the Lord it shall be "blotted out," and between Him and me there shall be nothing but a cleared and radiant space. It shall be blotted out as we blot out the handwriting from a slate. It shall be blotted out, as we wipe away a tear!

Is not this a glorious inspiration made possible by grace, that all the heinous and rebel life of my past days need no longer throw its black shadow between me and my Lord? Nothing between me and Him! And let us remember again, it is Peter who says it, and certainly he had something to look back upon with regret and tears. That day of denial and of bitter weeping no longer stood between him and his Lord. The fellowship was close, immediate, love-begotten, and past sin was no longer permitted to intrude its baneful alienation. The memory of his denial kept him humble and prudent; but the denial no longer smote him like a threat, or removed his Lord to the far-away. "Your sins are blotted out."

"THAT so there may come seasons of refreshing from the presence of the Lord." This word telling of "seasons of refreshing" is a most gracious one. It suggests a cool breath, allaying the feverishness of a life, the unhealthful heat of mind and soul. Peter here tells us that in the sultry vales of life, when otherwise the heart might turn faint, wonderful airs breathe upon the spirit and create "seasons of refreshing." We never quite know when the breeze will stir and begin its renewing ministry. It comes in most unexpected ways. But the point to remember is that God knows the best time, and the cool breath will come when there is danger of perilous heat. It will blow from the hills of God!

This promise of my text is for everybody, for the humblest and poorest of my hearers, as well as for those to whom the Lord has given providence and wealth. If anyone is hearing these words who is tired of life and tired in it, let him turn his weary mind to the Lord. Let him repent! And in the name of the Saviour, I can quietly promise that his threatening past shall be transfigured, and there shall blow upon his wasted and withered soul the quickening influence of the breath of God.

To Him who watches over his disciples while they rest, and walks with them when they toil over the dusty road, let us commit ourselves, in the confidence which cannot be disturbed by the world's noises nor frightened by its sin, nor put to death by its unbelief. And may He who knows our need better than we cry out for our wants, keep us in His tender care, now and evermore AMEN.

one's manner of thought. And what is the main essential of the change? It is to put in the thought of God. In the unrepentant man, "God is not in all his thoughts." To give God the supreme place is to live the penitent life. It seems to me to be a practical thing, and therefore a thing that may be practised. We are to bring God into all our purposes and ambitions and into all the little directions of our day's affairs. In my thought for my children, I must put my God into it. In my thought about my business, I must put my God into it. In my thought about my pleasure, I must put my God into it. There must be no purposed walking alone, bereft of the companionship of God.

If this is not penitence, I know not what it is. When the "unrighteous man forsakes his thoughts," and accepts the sovereignty of God, and allows that thought to dominate everything else, he has not begun the life of the saint. Such enthronement of God would give us new thoughts about everything else. Our dominant thought colors everything. If our dominant thought is God, then this will tend to shape and color all our conceptions of sin, temptation, duty and service. In everything we should have the mind of Christ.

"And turn again." Repentance implies a new mind; this "turning again" implies new

Water from the Rock

SUNDAY. Psa. 114:8. "The God of Jacob, which turned the rock into a pool of water, the flint into a fountain of waters." This is a strange and most unexpected fellowship of things. It would occasion me no surprise if I came upon a well in the garden of Eden. It would not awaken any wonder if I discovered a spring in the heart of a lovely valley, or rising on some sheltered upland, or in some nook on an open moor. But who anticipates rocks and springs? Who marries flints and fountains? Who would go wandering in a bare, gray valley of rocks looking for still waters? Who would search among the flints expecting to find the home of the gentle rain? And yet, this is the combination which this word of God presents to us. Rocks are wedded to springs, and flints to fountains. And these are symbols of similar wonders which are wrought in the realm of grace. And these are the experiences of brave, believing men and women who walk in the way of the Lord.

The saints of God find a plenteous supply of soft water in hard, rocky places. Fountains of grace spring up on the driest and flintiest roads. "Waters in the desert rise." God meets them in the ministry of beneficent surprise. Let us look at one of these saints and listen to his song as he journeys through the wilderness. For this is his song:—"In my distress Thou hast enlarged me." This man has been through hard experiences. He has been walking over a sharp and flinty road. Rocks have frowned upon him. No oasis of sheltering trees has relieved the heavy days. He has wakened in the morning to face a dry waste of trial, and he has lain down at night with the same sterile monotony before him. And what can you expect, in withering circumstances of this sort, except an impoverishment of his nature, a lessening of his capacity, and a drying up of all the genial currents of his soul?

But wonderful things began to happen. To his amazement, he found that the hard time was a growing time and that, in some strange way, the tree of his life was sucking nutriment out of the desert. There were magic pools somewhere; vital fountains were hiding somewhere. His spiritual capacity was increased. He began to add a cubit to his stature. Hardship unveiled his treasure. He was like a fern which has been removed from the sunlight and placed in the gloom. And in the gloom new fronds begin to uncoil, and vital things happen in the shade which could never have happened in the light. He began to have larger views of things—larger views of God, and man, and human life. The hard things brought enlightenment. The rock proved to be the dwelling-place of springs, and the flint the home of the fountain. The desert was a fine growing place. "In my distress Thou hast enlarged me."

Here is another of the saints of God. He is in captivity in Rome. Paul is shut in, walled in. His freedom has been changed into servitude. Hard? Yes, hard as a rock. A sharp experience? Yes, sharp as a flint. But now listen—"The things which happened unto me have turned out rather unto the furtherance of the Gospel." Who ever expected it? One might expect "rivers in high places," but to have fountains in these dry places is one of the miracles of God's amazing grace. God's vitalizing river of life is found in hard prison circumstances in Rome, nourishing the apostle's life, and directing it, and multiplying its influence, even when it seemed hemmed in by imperious restraints.

And so it is. Experiences, which are hard as rock, do not separate us from the love of God. Disappointments which are sharp as flint, do not sever our communion with His grace. God's wonderful waters can break through anything and everything. J. H. J.

Glad About God

MONDAY. Psa. 100:2. "Serve the Lord with gladness: come before His presence with singing." The beautiful words of the One Hundredth Psalm have always held a high place in both the Jewish and the Christian Churches. To this day the psalm is used in the synagogue every day except Sabbath and feast days. Our fathers used the metrical version in the Scotch church. The tune which so many of us use each Sunday morning as we sing the Doxology was written for this psalm. Hence the name "Old Hundred."

Though Jesus Christ requires from His followers the very best there is in them, yet, to serve Him should be the joy of our lives. It should fill our hearts with joy unspeakable that by Him we can come into the presence of the Father.

In his "Spiritual Autobiography" Lyman Abbott tells of his troubles and perplexities as a young man. As a youth he feared God, but was greatly disturbed by the interpretation of the Heavenly Father given in the pulpits of the land. His Christianity was a burden rather than a joy. While still distressed, he came under the influence of that wonderful preacher and wise counselor, Henry Ward Beecher. In the words of one of the reviewers of the book, the pastor of Plymouth Church made the lad "glad about God." It is a striking phrase, "glad about God." We have not yet discovered the message of Christ to our hearts until He had made us rejoice that we can serve God, jubilant that we can come into His presence.

It is not a message of words or logic alone that the Christ brings to us, for the language of the heart is better than the words of the dictionary and stronger than the syllogism of the logician. We are robbing ourselves unless from our religion we are receiving real joy. How can we fail to be glad when we have known the love of God revealed in Jesus?

May we learn the lesson which those stern old Westminster Fathers—men whom we are so inclined to ridicule for their severity—learned that "Man's chief end is to glorify God and enjoy him forever!" May we be "Glad about God"! J. A. M.

What Christ Means to the Christian

TUESDAY. Col. 3:11. "Christ is all and in all."

Before creation's morning, all the universe was in the mind of the Son of God, who was before all things and by whom all things were made. All the conceptions of the Infinite Architect, the Father, were given to the Son, that He might be the active agent of the works of creation. Therefore, Christ is appointed Heir of all things, upholding all things, filling all in all.

Stars may fall, planets burn, worlds perish, but Thou, O Christ, remainest! Thou art the same yesterday, today and forever. O marvelous truth, He who was given all power, offered Himself on Calvary for the redemption of the world. The hands that moulded the world bled for men; the crown of glory became a crown of thorns, while the King lay down in the grave and, Samson-like, carried away the gates of the city of the dead, that we might follow Him to the skies.

Is it any wonder that poor, perishing, sinful mortals will lay down their lives for Him who rescued the gem of the soul from the robber, making it lustrous with His beauty? Christ fulfilled all our fondest ideals, supplying all our needs, filling hearts with all the fullness of God. Should we not exclaim with joy, "Whom have I in heaven but Thee and there is none on earth I desire beside Thee?"

The divine image is wrought in human character that the race may be reborn into the original creation, the perfect manhood of men in Christ Jesus. Christ, therefore, is all and in all that we know of God the Father; in Him is found the consummate meaning of life, Sonship with the Father.

Think of a human soul barring Christ out of his life. Will not such be lamenting at last: O that I had known that Jesus created me, loved me, died for me, and is now preparing mansions in glory for my residence? If I had known, I would not have passed Him by!

Our Duty to Find Others

WEDNESDAY. Matt. 5:21. "Ye have heard that it was said by them of old times . . . but I say unto you." Jesus Christ was a pioneer. His was a profound reverence for things of the past, but He also brought a new emphasis upon the things of the present and stressed a policy for future conduct. That which He said has been the cause of social progress and human uplift through the centuries. He lifted humanity out of the bog of Pharisaical hypocrisy and the lowlands of an erroneous conception of God, to the freer heights and purer air of an aggressive missionary propaganda that makes Christianity inclusive of all the spiritual, mental and physical needs of the world. Conversion begins with the individual, but it does not end there. An individual is truly converted when he passes his conversion on to others.

The first chapter of John's gospel has been called the "finder's chapter." John found Jesus, Jesus found Philip, Philip found Nathanael, and Andrew found Peter. As soon as one man found Jesus, he went and found his brother for Jesus. This is how the Christian Church began. This is the method of its continuance. Two men, and each finding his brother. Two and two are four. The work of Jesus was not primarily preaching and teaching and working wonders, but finding men, fitting men, calling men, one by one.

To the Pharisees, religion was a thing of self. The old-time Gospel is not a Sunday sermon, but a week-day practice. The divine service held on the Sabbath is the preparation for the divine service that should be rendered every day. It addresses itself to civic righteousness, pleads for better conditions, insists on cleaner politics. It is a leaven for the daily walk. A gospel that is not all-inclusive and all-embracing of all the needs of humanity is something new and strange, but it is not a gospel that reveals the will of God and manifests the program of Jesus Christ. R. B.

A Rock for the Feet

THURSDAY. Rom. 8:38. "I am persuaded."

If we are going to uplift the world, we must, like Archimedes, have a place for our fulcrum. Guesses will not answer; dreams, speculations, perhapses will not do.

A rising inflection cuts the sinews of truth. I want a rock for my feet and two strong pillars for my hands.

The rock is the Divine Word; the two pillars, like Jachin and Boaz, are Faith and Reason. Thus grounded and buttressed I shall never be moved. I am now in a position to dogmatize.

I cannot do otherwise, since my postulates are beyond an "if." I cannot say "peradventure"; I can only say "verily, verily." This is dogmatism, certainly; but it is the dogmatism of an honest man.

When Jesus Was a Lad

FRIDAY. Acts 4:27. "Thy holy child Jesus."

We have only three pictures of Jesus as a child. They are word-pictures. The first two represent Him as a baby lying in His mother's arms, first in the manger of the inn at Bethlehem, and later in the temple. The third picture is twelve years later, and Jesus is a boy.

We know nothing else that happened to Jesus until He was a grown man and was baptized by John at the Jordan. And yet we know what His childhood must have been. Inasmuch as it is probable His foster-father died while Jesus was a lad, it is also probable that He became the breadwinner of the household, succeeding to Joseph's business as a carpenter, and working from early morning until late at night.

That was a lovely thing for Him to do, but Jesus was not the only child who has had to go to work before he was fully grown in order to provide food and shelter for a family. There are thousands of boys and girls who are doing just what Jesus did.

From what we know of Jesus as a man, we know He must have been a truthful child. It requires courage to make truth the rule of our lives. Akin to truth is justice, and Jesus must have been a just child. This means that in play He was fair. He would not take undue advantage. He would not cheat. He would scorn a victory secured by fraud. And Jesus must have been a generous child. No ungenerous child ever grew up to be a generous man or woman, and Jesus was the most generous man that ever lived. He was the kindest. How like the word "king" is the word "kind." They must come from the same root. One who observes the law of kindness is kingly. We may be certain Jesus possessed another quality—He was a reverent child. At the beginning of His ministry at Nazareth He went into the synagogue "as His custom was." Then He read from the Scriptures, "as His custom was." The habit of prayer, the habit of worship, the habit of Bible reading—these create reverence. And the habit of courage makes us strong, even as He was strong. C. C. A.

All for Christ

SATURDAY. Mal. 3:10. "Prove me now here-with if I will not open you the windows of heaven and pour you out a blessing that there shall be not room enough to receive it." Today we are thinking of the stewardship of life. As we look out across the world, we see the tragedy of chaotic conditions brought on by selfish living, the peril of riches, the sadness of want and the despair of men who lack the knowledge of Christ. The Gospel brings tidings of a life that can be lived above the despair of human things, and he who finds the secret of the Christ is bound by that very knowledge to make known the precious knowledge to others.

A world filled with anxiety, chaotic conditions, hearts of men failing them for fear, sadness, sorrow, gloom, terror, and death can be changed, but only through the power of the risen Christ. He who knows what it is to find the Christ of Calvary and of the third day, should so rejoice over the gladness that has come, that his heart will have no hesitancy about any sacrifice that shall give this boon to others.

As good soldiers of Christ, in view of a cross and a tomb which could not hold the Lord of Life, the Church is on its way to victory far greater than that of the Marne or Chateau-Thierry, but there is no more crucial test of our loyalty and of our love, than of stewardship and the stewardship is of service, of money, of prayer and of life.

The imperial command of Jesus Christ that His followers pray to be thrust out into the harvest field, offering life and putting at His disposal all their possessions, has been heard by millions and many a Moffatt, a Grenfell or Carey, by business men and faithful-hearted women all over the world, and loyal hearts and true have put all of the time, money, and love into the hand of Christ Jesus for service. ## An Open Letter to the Churches

LITTLE more than two months from today, the International Disarmament Conference will assemble in Washington. If it accomplishes the purpose for which it is called, it will mark the beginning of a new era in human history.

We have seen, since the close of the great war, instead of a world at peace, a continuance of warfare in three continents and a reckless spendthrift race for armed superiority between the leading nations, who ought to be setting the world a better example. While the populations, sick of strife, are hungering and praying for lasting peace, preparations for "the war of the future" have gone on, while almost all the treasures are exhausted and national bankruptcy looms up ahead as the inevitable outcome to both victor and vanquished.

To banish that possibility and put an end to the wicked extravagance and want and suffering which it involves—to say nothing of the appalling waste of human life—is the prime purpose of the Conference which will meet at the Nation's Capital on November 11. Its object is to bring the five leading powers into line on a practical platform, which will assure a general reduction of armaments to the lowest point compatible with reasonable national needs, thus opening the way to world peace.

In this struggle toward a peaceful and harmonious world, our own government, to its everlasting credit be it said, has courageously taken the initiative. Our challenge to armament reduction and world friendship has been taken up promptly by Great Britain, France, Italy and Japan, while a long line of nations that were neutral during the war stand ready to support the Conference at the proper moment. Never was the outlook for fraternal international relations over the whole globe so full of promise.

Our statesmen, our publicists, the foremost educators and the leaders of the press are all earnestly championing the movement looking to a reduction of armaments, and a broader and friendlier international politics. Our ablest economists applaud the program as indispensable to world progress. Labor sees in it the harbinger of peace and prosperity.

And the Church—where does she stand? Silent, uncertain, in the background, at a time when every church and pastor and congregation in America should be at the very forefront, aiding with prayers and every spiritual encouragement those who are striving for the greatest prize of the centuries. Here and there some broad-minded ministers have lifted their voices and spoken out on the Church's duty to support the President and the Conference; but with these few courageous exceptions, the pulpit, which should lead the advance for every movement that is in line with God's purposes, has been irresolute, hesitant, dumb.

The Christian Herald believes in the Church, and has always stood staunchly by it in repelling the assaults of its enemies. We feel that it is facing today, in this supreme issue, its greatest opportunity. So to the thirty thousand or more ministers who will read this open letter, we would say that it is an issue so great as to involve not alone the well-being and righteous action of this nation, but of all nations. Further, it is one that makes direct appeal to every pastor, whatever his denomination, and it is one which must be faced conscientiously and courageously NOW. The Church must lift up its voice in vigorous approval of the effort to limit the possibilities of war. This it owes to its great record in humane reform, to its high spiritual position, and to the people of our own land, who are beginning to regard its attitude of silence or indifference with undisguised amazement.

We therefore invite you, and every pastor who reads this letter, to turn to our proposition of the Christian Churches of America on page 609 of this issue, and after a thorough reading, arrange to present the matter to your officers and congregation so that your church and people may go on record as giving cordial support to this great world movement for peace and disarmament. Thus through your example and that of others who are like-minded, the undertaking will enjoy the full co-operation of the churches, lifting it up from the domain of diplomacy to the higher sphere of international righteousness and ultimately, under God's blessing, the Church may thus be the means of enabling the movement to realize its great objective.

China's Gratitude

IT IS a gracious message which the government of China has sent to those governments and organizations that came to the rescue of her perishing people, in the greatest famine she has ever fought. The special mandate received by Secretary Hughes speaks for the entire Chinese people in terms of the highest admiration and sincerest thankfulness:

"The governments of friendly nations have strengthened the bonds of international friendship by the manifestation of their zeal in collecting huge sums for relief and in saving enormous numbers of our famine-stricken people. Meditating on their acts of benevolence and their works of compassion, we see their complete response to the claims of righteousness for the relief of distress, and the manifestation of pity for a neighbor nation. The entire body of our fellow-citizens is moved by a spirit of profound gratitude and respect."

The readers of the Christian Herald were the first to respond in China's time of need. It was through their influence and activity that our government and people came into the relief movement on a scale of splendid, nation-wide generosity that has never been equalled in any land. We look back with thankfulness over the work accomplished. America did its duty as it always does. The outcome, as the Chinese Minister for Foreign Affairs has expressly declared, has been the restoration of "a million victims of famine to life and happiness."

A million lives saved! This is a record beyond price.

A Timely Warning

UNITED STATES Senator William E. Borah, who introduced the resolution in Congress providing for an International Conference on general armament reduction, has done another splendid piece of work in an article contributed to "The Nation's Business," in which he points out that "our people are at the present time expending as much for our army and navy as the entire reparation claims against Germany." It is the most convincing material argument thus far advanced, and deserves to be read everywhere. He regards it as imperative to our national progress and well-being to put an end, not only to the armed rivalry in land forces, but to the frenzied naval competition between the United States, Japan and Great Britain, as the only means of lessening the terrific economic strain.

He touches the real heart of the matter when he says the main obstacle to be overcome is "the reliance we have come to have in force as the only power left on earth with which to govern men"—a reliance which he rightly denounces as barbaric and altogether unworthy to be tolerated by a professedly Christian nation. He points out that Germany's annual reparation payment is $500,000,000, plus 26 per cent. of her export values ($260,000,000) making a total of $760,000,000. Our expenditures for military and naval purposes during the last fiscal year up to June 21 were $825,837,939. The army and navy bills passed recently by Congress total $830,000,000. Unless the terrible tension which this imposes upon our people be greatly relaxed, it will have cost us in forty years more than Germany's total indemnity. With France, England and Japan running the same mad race, their showing on the same basis would probably be equally surprising.

The lesson to be drawn from such a condition is obvious. Germany in the end would come out, financially and economically, the substantial victor, while the great powers would have saddled themselves with a burden that would result in the impoverishment of all the nations involved, the consequences of which can hardly be over-estimated.

Church and College

AT THE meeting of the National Council of Congregational Churches of America, recently held at Los Angeles, the subject most emphasized and discussed was the subject of religious education, and especially the relation of the colleges, once under the close supervision of the churches, to the churches from which for one reason or another have become separated the religious teaching and impression which once marked them.

It is not a boast of the Congregational body, but rather a statement of historical fact that some thirty-two prominent colleges in America were founded directly by churches of that order, including Harvard, Yale, Dartmouth, Williams, Oberlin, Grinnell, and Beloit. But it is now considered vital to the future recruiting of educated men for the ministry that college institutions of every type have a closer relation to the church or to the religious influence than they have at present. The action of the Council in forming what amounts to a new society, to take steps to bring about a college co-operation with church support, is significant, following the alarming falling off of educated men from the theological student body.

It is hardly necessary to emphasize the need of an educated ministry for the churches. It is impossible to think of an ignorant or uncultured Christ. The early church would have made no progress without an educated Paul. The Middle Ages or the Dark Ages illustrate what happened to the religious life of mankind when an educated ministry died out. Nothing but the Renaissance made possible the Reformation. The Puritans were many of them Cambridge College graduates. An ignorant immigrant colony coming over in the Mayflower could never have planted the Church and the public school together.

If the Church is to conquer the world for Christ, it must have trained leaders. And if the colleges are going to fulfill the purpose their early founders had, they must at least furnish a good percentage of their graduates for religious leadership. It is not a fair proportion when, as is true of one large college of over two thousand students, out of a graduating class of one hundred and thirty, eighty-seven become engineers, thirty-two go into mercantile life, and one enters the ministry. And this is true of a college that is not organized to turn out secular pursuits, but to give a general education for service of a general character.

It is a duty and a task for all the religious bodies in America to work out the problem of bringing religion and education together into the closest bond. Religion without education is weak. But education without religion is wicked.

By Proxy

THE Minister was in his study answering his correspondence. His stenographer had already opened the morning mail.

"The Board of Deaconesses call your attention to a case of real need in the S— family. The mother is sick and the father is out of work."

"Refer the case to the Social Service Committee."

"There is a young man waiting in the Janitor's room to see you about something important."

"Ask the President of the Brotherhood to look his case up."

"There are several letters asking for advice on the question of unemployment."

"Drop them a line suggesting the State Employment Bureau."

"Mr. G. writes to know if you can do something to keep his boy away from the Smoke Houses in town."

"Refer him to the Anti-Cigarette League."

"A number of letters here asking for personal advice in cases of ill-health."

"Suggest they consult the Hygiene Society. It has been organized for that purpose."

"That is all this morning."

Minister heaves a sigh of relief.

"Now I can get at my sermon."

Business Man in his office, same morning. In comes Philanthropist.

"We need help in several very desperate cases of real need among families who cannot pay rent, owing to the man being out of work."

Business Man pulls check book towards him and makes out a liberal amount. Philanthropist thanks Business Man and goes out.

An hour later Business Man is called up on phone by Minister. "What! You want me to take a class in the Bible School! Impossible. I need Sunday for rest. Ask Mr. D. He is a man of leisure and will fill in nicely." Hangs up receiver.

Later in the day Philanthropist is in his office going over the calls of the humanity that are his business. In about this order he disposes of "cases."

"Refer the man to the Co-operative Society."

"Send the family to the Poor Commissioner."

"Belongs to the Orphan Asylum."

"Write to the City Relief Agency."

"Get the Church to assume the burden."

"Tell the man to call again after his case has been considered by the Committee."

"Have not time to give to this case. Refer it to the State Labor Commissioner."

And when night comes, the Minister, the Business Man and the Philanthropist lie down to a well-earned rest, after serving humanity "by proxy." They have seen very little of the human need at first hand. The "Society" or the "League" or the "Committee" or the "Organization" has done it. And they in turn have not come in contact, except officially, with the human "cases."

How much of our very charity is done for us by some one else? How much philanthropy is there in some of the official kind? Jesus found time to take the little children in his own arms. Modern philanthropy says "Let the Asylum do it. We are too busy."

The World News of the Week

Lloyd George Urges American-British-Japanese Entente on Pacific

AN EARNEST desire that the Anglo-Japanese alliance should emerge into a greater understanding of the United States, Great Britain and Japan on all problems of the Pacific—a great event which would be a guarantee for the peace of the world—was expressed by Premier Lloyd George in an address to the House of Commons reporting on the work of the Imperial Conference of Premiers recently held in London. Such an agreement, the Premier declared, would be the surest way of making a success of the International Disarmament Conference which is to open in Washington on November 11.

Reviewing the loyalty with which the Japanese carried out their obligations under the alliance during the World War, the Premier suggested that it would be unfair to break off the alliance now that Britain's hour of need had passed. "That does not mean we are to continue an alliance of this kind on any point against any one else," he added. "Certainly not against the United States. It is the cardinal point of British policy, and must be, that she would act in as complete accord with the United States as any two countries can, but I do not see why it is impossible to remember our obligations to Japan, to preserve our friendship with that great country and at the same time to preserve the spirit of fraternity with the United States, and that is one of the questions I hope it will be possible to have discussions upon."

Stressing again the importance of America's friendship, Premier Lloyd George declared: "We were all agreed in the Imperial Conference in the desire to have complete friendship with the United States of America and to make arrangements which would remove every conceivable prospective obstacle to such friendship. Nothing would please the British Dominions, as well as the mother country, more than a settlement which would make them feel that the British Empire and the United States could work side by side in common partnership for the preservation of peace and for guaranteeing the peace of the world. I do not know any guarantees that would be equal to that—the United States of America and the British Empire in common agreement on the principle on which a world peace ought to be based. I am still hopeful that such an understanding as would make us feel that this partnership could be established will ensue as a result of the coming conference in Washington."

Briand Coming to Conference

HOPES that the premiers will head the delegations of the various Powers to the Disarmament Conference were strengthened when Premier Briand of France informed the American Government that he would be in personal attendance. This announcement was regarded as making it virtually certain that Premier Lloyd George would come as the chief of the British delegates, a course that has been widely discussed in the British press, and it was believed Japan would wish to send a representative of equal rank. Thus the Washington assemblage promises to fall little short of the Paris peace conference itself in the array of distinguished men present.

President Harding has been proceeding deliberately in choosing the American delegation so it may be the strongest possible. Senator Henry Cabot Lodge, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, was his next selection after Secretary Hughes had been designated to head the American group. Others mentioned most prominently for places on the delegation, which is expected to number six or seven, were Elihu Root, Senators Knox and Underwood, and James W. Davis, former Ambassador to Britain. Women's organizations were appealing to the President to name one woman delegate, but without centering their efforts on any particular candidate.

A preliminary appropriation of $200,000 for the expenses of the American delegation was sought, the grant being tacked on to the Deficiency bill. It afforded a chance for a demand in the Senate that the American delegates to work for open sessions of the conference.

Irish Debate British Offer

THE Dail Eireann, its 130 members sworn to defend the Irish Republic and to yield no voluntary support "to any pretended government authority or power within Ireland hostile and inimical thereto," has been proceeding leisurely in its consideration of the peace offer of the British Government.

The first day's session, which was open, was devoted to the formalities of organization, including the election of Professor John MacNeill as Speaker, and to an address by Eamon de Valera in which he declared his cabinet had rejected Premier Lloyd George's proposals because they were unjust and in which he reiterated his demand for the complete independence of Ireland from the British Empire. The second day

DR. HARDING AND HIS BRIDE

She was Miss Alice Seaverns and had assisted the President's father in his practice for several years before their marriage. Marion reports state that she will continue to help in his office was spent in hearing the reports of the Irish cabinet members on the conduct of their departments and a second speech by Mr. de Valera in which he referred to attempts to win the allegiance of Ulster and declared a willingness to make sacrifices on its behalf which he would never think of making to Great Britain. Succeeding sessions of the Dail Eireann were secret.

Despite the firmness with which the Sinn Fein leaders declared for rejection of the British terms, there was optimism both in Irish and British quarters that a breaking off of the negotiations might be avoided. Mr. de Valera's utterances were attributed in large part to a desire to force further concessions, especially in regard to Ulster, where, however, it appeared that sentiment in favor of retaining the present status was hardening. Reference of the issue to a vote of the Irish people in case the Dail Eireann itself decides against outright acceptance was the hope of the moderates on each side. It was expected, however, that the reply would be a refusal which would permit further negotiations.

40,000 MILES IN A BIBLE CAR TOUR

That is the record of Mr. and Mrs. Wilbert P. Cooke, of Washington, D. C., who have visited nearly every county in Pennsylvania, Maryland and Virginia in their Gospel work. They distributed 89,000 Testaments and 678,000 tracts and leaflets

House Passes Tax Bill

WITH adjournment for the period from August 24 to September 21 voted by the Senate, members of Congress have been trying to dispose of the more important bills pending, but have failed to make notable progress.

The House, however, managed to pass the tax revision bill by a vote of 274 to 125, after several days of partisan debate, and the Senate Finance Committee will be able to work on the measure during the recess. The Democratic caucus decided unanimously to fight the bill and adopted a resolution denouncing it as taking the financial load off the shoulders of the rich and shifting it to those of the poor, a charge which Republican orators vigorously controverted.

Much oratory was expended in each house on the Willis-Campbell anti-beer bill, over which the conferees remained deadlocked, despite the insistence of dry advocates that it should be passed before the recess. The main features of the measure—preventing the prescribing of beer as medicine and limiting the quantity of beer a physician may prescribe for a patient—were in no danger, but there were determined efforts to insert amendments which it was feared would impede officials in enforcing national prohibition. One of these amendments was assailed as legalizing home brewing, by forbidding the issuance of warrants for the searching of private residences unless there is reason to believe that therein liquor is manufactured for sale or is sold. The dries were divided on these debatable provisions, and any conference decision was sure to be attacked.

RUSSIA ACCEPTS HOOVER RELIEF TERMS. The Bolshevik envoy at Riga after prolonged negotiations has conceded all the demands made by the American Relief Administration regarding the conduct of relief operations for famine victims in Soviet Russia, and Herbert Hoover at once issued orders for the prompt despatch of food stuffs.

In approving the Hoover plans, President Harding urged that all American efforts should be conducted through one organization and announced that passports for relief work in Russia would be issued only to those in the service of the American Relief Administration.

LEAGUE COUNCIL CONVENED. Viscount Ishii, Japanese Ambassador to Paris and President of the League of Nations Council, has called a meeting of the Council in Geneva on August 29 to consider the Silesian question.

UNIVERSITY RELEASES GENERAL WOOD. The University of Pennsylvania Board of Trustees has granted to Major General Leonard Wood a leave of absence until September 1, 1922, in order to enable him to become Governor General of the Philippines.

GREEKS RENEW DRIVE IN TURKEY. The Greek army has made rapid progress in a renewal of its offensive against the Turkish Nationalists and has reached the Sakaria River, sixty miles west of Angora and the last strong defensive position before Mustapha Kemal's capital. ## Senator Borah Sends Best Wishes

IT WAS Senator William E. Borah of Idaho who, with his disarmament conference amendment to the naval appropriation bill, brought to a head the demand for a meeting of the powers, and we advised Senator Borah of our plan to enlist the support of the churches of the country in the success of the conference. In reply we have this telegram:

"Your idea is a splendid one. It has my heartiest sympathy and best wishes for success.

(Signed) William E. Borah."

What Clergymen and Laymen Say

Dr. Peter Ainslee

I am in hearty sympathy with the nation-wide peace endorsement. I shall be glad to serve on your committee and to do all that you have asked in your letter. The whole church ought to respond to this appeal. I believe you will find such a response as will secure the co-operation of all forward-looking ministers in every denomination as well as the forward-looking laymen; for to be burdened with great armaments and to share in the practice of war is an uncivilized condition which we ought to abandon as we have abandoned the saloon, slavery, polygamy, etc.

I am heartily with you in this movement and am pleased that a paper so strong and influential as the Christian Herald has espoused such a worthy cause.

(Signed) PETER AINSLEE.

Rt. Rev. Charles H. Brent

(Bishop of Western New York)

I am in fullest accord with all that you say. I can sign con amore the resolution you enclose. It would be out of the question for me to take part on any committee. I have no time left to give. I am constantly speaking, preaching and teaching the principles which you would like to promote.

(Signed) C. H. BRENT.

Dr. W. W. Pinson

(Secretary Board of Missions, Methodist Episcopal Church, South)

I am taking my first opportunity to reply to your letter of August 2d in re: the International Peace Conference soon to meet in Washington.

I am in thorough accord with all that you say in your letter and am sure that the only way to reach any satisfactory results in this matter is by rallying the Christian conscience of the nations involved and securing the application of Christian principles to international relationships.

I shall be very glad to act as a member of such a committee as you suggest and co-operate in any possible way with the purpose indicated.

(Signed) W. W. PINSON.

Robert H. Gardiner

(Secretary Commission of Protestant Episcopal Church on World Conference on Faith and Order)

I shall be glad to serve as a member of the Committee on the National Peace Endorsement. Inasmuch as there was a Disarmament Sunday early in June, I would suggest that the appropriate thing now would be to ask all the churches to unite in prayer on the Sunday nearest to November 11, the date of Armistice Day. Meanwhile I think it would be quite important to forward to President Harding a Resolution expressing warm commendation of the wise course he is pursuing and with it send our hopes for the best results from the Conference.

(Signed) ROBERT H. GARDINER.

Dr. Arthur J. Brown

(Secretary Board of Foreign Missions, Presbyterian Church in the U. S. A.)

I am strongly sympathetic with the proposed National Peace Endorsement and gladly accept membership on the Committee.

(Signed) ARTHUR J. BROWN.

William J. Bryan

I am in hearty sympathy with your suggestion. The churches should act unitedly, separately and at once. . . . Please count me in on any place that brings support to the President's effort to bring about universal disarmament as a means of hastening universal peace. Allow me to add a word of caution confidentially. Some, in advocating disarmament by agreement say that we cannot do anything without agreement. Now that the conference is called we can support disarmament by agreement without discussing what should be done if agreement fails. We must make disarmament by agreement a success if possible.

(Signed) W. J. BRYAN.

Rev. Francis E. Clark, D. D.

(President United Society of Christian Endeavor)

I think nothing is so important as such a plan as you propose just at this juncture. I have been hammering on this general subject week after week in the Christian Endeavor World and shall not cease to do so.

I think the points that you make are most important in this fight for a warless world. Perhaps you have noticed that one of the slogans of the great Christian Endeavor convention was "A Warless World by 1923." It is not impossible if we all work for it.

(Signed) FRANCIS E. CLARK.

Dr. Don O. Shelton

(President, The National Bible Institute)

It will give me pleasure to serve on the Peace Endorsement Committee in accordance. As there can be no assurance of world-wide peace apart from the reign of Christ in the hearts of men, it is important that the transcendent worth of His Gospel shall be illustrated and confirmed by the evangelistic fervor of the Christian Church in behalf of all nationalities.

(Signed) DON O. SHELTON.

John Wanamaker

Thanking you for your letter, I am pleased to have my name attached to the Peace Endorsement proposed in your letter of August 2nd. Therefore, I enclose the signed letter.

(Signed) JOHN WANAMAKER.

Bishop William F. Anderson

Gladly accept appointment Committee.

(Signed) BISHOP WILLIAM F. ANDERSON.

Mrs. Helen B. Montgomery

(President Woman's American Baptist Foreign Missionary Society)

Delighted to allow use of my name on Peace Committee.

(Signed) HELEN B. MONTGOMERY.

Rev. Carter Helm Jones

(Pastor First Baptist Church, Philadelphia, Pa.)

I find myself in hearty accord with your program for International Peace and Righteousness and shall be glad to serve on the proposed committee.

(Signed) CARTER HELM JONES.

Dr. E. Y. Mullins

(Southern Baptist Theological Seminary)

I understand from your letter that the committee which you are seeking to organize is purely informal, not connected with any general organization, and that its sole purpose is to promote sentiment for disarmament among the religious forces of America. If I am correct in my general understanding, you may use my name on the committee.

(Signed) E. Y. MULLINS.

Rev. Earnest M. Stires

(Rector St. Thomas Church, New York)

You may depend upon the co-operation of Saint Thomas's Church and its Rector.

It is not possible to get the official action of our vestry at present, as the members are widely scattered, but action will be taken as soon as it is practicable to hold a meeting.

(Signed) ERNEST M. STIRES.

Rev. G. Campbell Morgan

The suggestion has my complete sympathy, and in my judgment it will be of enormous advantage if the Church of Christ in America places itself on record at a time like this.

So far as I am concerned I very much doubt the wisdom of my name being associated with such a movement, and that for the following reasons:

1. I am not an American citizen, nor do I intend to become one. In my judgment it would be better for a movement of this kind to be wholly within the borders of the Church as constituted within the national life.

2. It would be impossible for me to serve on such a Committee. The only measure in which I could take part would be by the fact of my name appearing in connection with it. That to me is always an unsatisfactory thing.

3. I have no church over which I am in oversight as minister. Of course opportunities might come to me to speak in support of such a movement in meetings I conduct in different parts of the country.

Having said so much, I add that if, in spite of what I have written, those responsible for the movement feel that the addition of my name would be of any real value, my objections may be over-ruled; for as I have said at the beginning, I am absolutely in sympathy with the suggestion.

(Signed) G. CAMPBELL MORGAN.

cup of tea brought to his study at supper-time and had not appeared at the meal to which she sat down with their two children, aged respectively ten and eight.

Arrived at home the pastor sought his study to dispose of manuscript and lesser official papers consigned to him in the vestry. Then he washed hands and face and presented himself in the dining-room, a normal hungry man and husband ready for supper and talk. The wife had both ready.

"Mrs. Abbott sent it over this afternoon," she informed her spouse, designating by a wave of the hand the repast she had set in dainty array at the foot of the table. "Oyster salad, cold chicken and Charlotte Russe. Could anything be more tempting? The dear soul recollects your weakness for all three."

"It is anything but a weakness tonight!" ejaculated the minister, drawing up his chair and attacking the chicken with zest. "I have a canine hunger upon me, as somebody makes her hero confess under similar circumstances. And our charming neighbor is as discriminating as she is bountiful."

"Do you know?"—resumed the wife thoughtfully when the edge of the canine hunger was partially dulled, "that I have been reckoning up the leading events of the years that have rolled by since we 'pitched our moving tent' in this corner of Paradise, and wondering if another parsonage had been as full of happiness. If we are to believe the 'Sunnyside' and 'Shadyside' books written by ex-pastors' wives, our lot is a brilliant exception. We are encompassed by an atmosphere of affectionate appreciation."

"Truly the lines have fallen to us in pleasant places!" quoted Stuart.

WHEN supper was over and they were seated upon the porch in the moonlight, silence fell between them for some minutes. The beauty of the night possessed them both like a spell. Stillness that might be felt by sensitive spirits had settled upon the town. The fragrance of roses and honeysuckle filled the breezeless air. The shadow of shrubbery and trees lay motionless upon the lawn. Yet there was no sultriness in the September calm. The bay and beyond that the great and wide sea kept the air fresh and bracing.

The wife spoke softly presently: "I am glad—" she began—the phrase was so often upon her tongue that it slipped from it easily—"I am glad that the Parsonage is a cottage and not a commonplace modern genteel residence." All that it lacks to make it 'my lowly thatched cottage' is real straw upon the roof. And do you know?"— animatedly—"that since we have had so much rain this summer, there is really a delicate tracery (doesn't that sound well?) of moss between the shingles on the northern side of the roof? If one makes believe very hard and the moon is not quite full, it is absolutely thatchey. It helps out the figure of poetic speech."

"I had not noticed it," he said, with a laugh. "I suppose it ought to be scraped off, but if it pleases your poetic fancy, it shall not be touched. I agree with you that our home could not be more lovely. As I looked over the congregation today, and recollected that it was comparatively small when I entered upon the work here, I said to myself for the hundredth time, 'My cup runneth over! God make me worthy of the benefits He has showered upon me!' There was not a vacant seat in the house, and I have already the names of ten who will present themselves for admission to the church at our next Communion service, two weeks from today. I called yesterday upon the three girls of your Bible class who had spoken to you of their wish to come forward at that time, and was much gratified by their testimony to your faithful teachings and the effect of these upon themselves. Yours is a blessed ministry, my love, to others as well as to your unworthy husband."

The answer was emphasized by a sob; her hand sought his impulsively.

"Thank you a thousand times, my darling! But I cannot have you couple 'unworthy' with your name even in thought. You are noble and good in everything, I am thankful—oh, so thankful to be able to hold up your hands in any way. I know how Phineas and Hur felt when Moses let them hold up his while the fight was going on below. That reminds me"—the irrepressible gaiety breaking through the softened mood—"of a story my father used to tell of a minister who had a very active wife. She bossed all manner of church societies, and it was more than hinted, took a hand with him once in a while. So people tried hard not to look too much amused when at a meeting of Presbytery, the Home Mission work done by the church of Reverend Moses Carr was highly commended, and one witty brother laid much stress upon the co-operation of Phineas and Her."

THE minister recalled the anecdote next morning with a smile that was more loving than amused as he made the first pastoral call of the week upon the cripple of whom Mr. Lawson had spoken to his guest. For the poor soul owed more of the comparative comfort of her present condition to Mrs. Haile than to the whole parish combined. She it was who by the time she had been three months in the Parsonage brought before the charitable women of the church the state of the widow Catherine Bates, who had been paralyzed after a severe illness and was unable to lift herself from her bed.

Mrs. Bates met the visitor with a bright smile that illumined her rugged, homely face like the shining of a hidden lamp.

"I was sure you would be here today, or that something else pleasant was coming to me—I felt so sort of uplifted! Not that something nice isn't coming to me every day. It's wonderful—or it would be if what some folks call 'happenings' weren't so common that we get used to them. Don't take that chair—please! That one over there is ever so much easier. Mrs. Wells gave it to me last Christmas."

She had talked herself out of breath in her happiness at seeing him. He sank back with a contented sigh, into the recesses of the cushioned chair and now laid a parcel on her lap.

"Mrs. Haile told me to give that to you with her love. She hopes you are enjoying this beautiful September weather. She has not forgotten that tomorrow is your birthday. You are not to open the parcel until then, and not to forget that our best wishes go with the little gift."

Mrs. Bates laid the parcel wrapped in tissue-paper and tied with pink ribbon tenderly down upon a table at her side. The moisture glittered upon her eyelids. She swallowed hard before trying to speak.

"Does she ever forget anything that could make anybody else happy or help them in any way? I often think she must have gone to school to the angels before she was born into this world. She surely is a ministering spirit."

He drew a small book from an inner pocket. "Now may I read a Psalm and pray with you? I should like to stay longer, but Monday is my busy day, you know. What Psalm would you like to have?"

The answer was prompt: "The One Hundred and Third, if you please, sir. It's been saying itself over and over in my mind all day."

The look that went with him to the door when the brief prayer that followed the psalm was said, and the parting salutation was over, relined the homely face almost into comeliness. Years seemed to have rolled from her body and soul.

"Yet she has done me more good than I have brought to her," he mused. "The reflex blessing is the more durable. May it not be reckoned among the 'Uncovenanted Mercies.'"

ALL that came to him on this golden September day were so many variations of the same opus.

And to this field—this vineyard which the Lord had planted he had been called! What more could man wish than to live and labor here while mortal life endured? He drew in deep breaths of the bracing sea-air, and looking before him saw the graceful spire of his church drawn sharply against the September heavens. The street leading up to it was lined with homes that had been occupied by the same families for generations past—for the most part spacious and all well kept in the midst of embowering trees and backed by flourishing gardens. It was a neighborly community. He knew the name and something of the personality of the occupants of each dwelling. A majority of them belonged to his parish. He "shepherded" them. The provincial phrase was sweet to his ears.

He had an important committee meeting in his church study at eleven o'clock. He had still fifteen minutes to spare when he arrived. The study was clean and cool; the seats arranged about the table in the middle of the room. The sexton, having made all ready, had gone off to other duties. The pastor opened a Bible and made an entry in his note-book of a text for a future sermon:

"One thing have I desired of the Lord: that I will seek after—That I may dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of my life, to behold the beauty of the Lord and to enquire in His temple."

CHAPTER III

THE better of the two hotels in Marlinton, spacious and well-kept, bore upon the register on a Saturday in September this entry:

|                 |               |
|-----------------|---------------|
| Silas Ford      | New York City |
| James MacArthur |               |
| Thomas White    |               |
| Oscar G. Evans  |               |

They were, as one of the quartet made occasion to remark to the hotel clerk—business acquaintances of Mr. Ford and had agreed "to run off for a week-end to some pleasant place not too far from the city to make the trip a trouble instead of a vacation."

The New Yorkers breakfasted late Sunday morning, and after loitering upon the veranda, sallied forth churchward, but in a desultory fashion implying to porch loungers uncertainty of intention as to the terminus of their ramble through the shady streets. Arrived at the church-yard gate at last strokes of the bell, the four sauntered into the enclosure, eying the building carelessly, and entered the vestibule.

"Would you like to sit together?" whispered the usher in waiting.

"It is of no consequence how you seat us," was his warrant for settling Mr. Ford and Mr. Evans on one side of the middle aisle and the other two in seats nearer the pulpit and across the way. All four had a fine view of the man who arose in the pulpit with the congregation below at the first notes of the Old Hundred Doxology. He was apparently about thirty-five years of age, six feet in height, and with a soldierly rather than a priestly bearing. The head was nobly formed, the face intellectual, refined, and in speaking, rarely expressive. Not one of the three strangers glanced toward Silas Ford. If their eyes had met his the verdict would have been unanimous and he would have accepted it as approval of his judgment thus far. Stuart Haile's presence when in the sacred desk was commandingly gracious. So far so good.

I need not waste time in informing the intelligent church-going reader that the quartet of metropolitan citizens constituted a committee delegated to "select a pastor." The clergyman who had served them in this capacity for twelve years was—according to the chronology of the modern Vineyard of the Lord—so nearly superannuated as to make his discharge imperatively expedient. James MacArthur, Scotch by birth and shrewd as became his inheritance from ancestors who had heard John Knox in his prime, had perpetrated a witticism in a private meeting of elders and deacons that had become the rallying cry of the disaffected.

Always say "Bayer"

Aspirin is the trade mark of Bayer Manufacture of Monoaceticacidester of Salicylicacid upon the people the need of a change of pastors?" an honest, but, as it appeared, thick-headed deacon had asked.

Elder MacArthur's brogue was unusually pronounced in the ready rejoinder.

"Say there are sixty-three reasons, and that in twelve months more there 'ull be sixty-four."

The roar that jarred the big Bible upon the table in the session room, made further argument superfluous.

YET up to the date of that meeting in which the elders and deacons of the church decided the present pastor had outlived his "period of usefulness" and that the best interests of the church demanded a change of shepherds not one in ten of the congregation that filled the pews Sabbath after Sabbath surmised that the man who had baptized their babies, tended their sick and been as a brother in the hour of affliction, was no longer fit to abide with and serve them. It was true, they had to admit tearfully, that he would be sixty-four years old in another year, and that the consensus of the modern church draws the dead-line at fifty-five.

But the stubborn fact must be faced and dealt with that the interests of the Banner Church and parish demanded a change of generals. Omitting the tiresome (and sickening) details of the manner in which the truth was impressed diplomatically upon the minds of the "people," we come to the evening when Elder Silas Ford called a special conference of the session and ten leading members to be held in his library, and told with unction and fervor of what he styled a "find" in the vicinity of the city. No need, according to him, to send overseas or across the Continent for the right man. It was settled from the outset of the undertaking that the incumbent of the highly desirable pulpit, who had been absent in England for his vacation, should be removed with the least imaginable trouble to all parties concerned, and without a suspicion of discredit.

The army retired officers upon half-pay at a certain age. The Church would act wisely in doing the like. At the right time the incumbent of the Banner Church pulpit should be kindly and quietly advised that the congregation had unwillingly arrived at the conclusion that a change of leadership was a spiritual and material necessity. Therefore, knowing that he rated the good of the Church above personal convenience and liking, they suggested that he should resign the office and leave the field open for a younger man.

It was the unanimous verdict of the listeners to Mr. Ford's address that night, that he had surpassed himself in the breadth of his views and left nothing to be desired in the line of pecuniary provision for the prospective retired clergyman and his household. The moment could not have been more auspicious for launching upon the company there collected the story of the "find" Silas had (again we borrow his own expression) "up his sleeve."

Before the meeting adjourned, it was resolved that a paper be drawn up by two lawyers present to be given to Rev. Samuel Stenson, D.D., incorporating the sense of the conference just held, and informing him in the most affectionate and regretful terms that as one facetious member of the Committee remarked, "the Church had sent in his resignation."

THUS cocked and primed, our Committee, after skillfully avoiding the observation that would have followed upon the discovery of their errand, and with especial regard to the awkwardness of arousing in the preacher's mind a suspicion of their character and purpose—were demurely respectful while the preliminary exercises of the sanctuary went on. The church was spacious for a country town and packed to the doors with a well-dressed, well-mannered congregation. This spoke favorably for the "drawing" qualities of one who had held the position of spiritual leader in a thriving community for ten years. A gratifying percentage of the audience was composed of young men and women. Another encouraging symptom for the success of the present confidential expedition was jotted down in mental note-books. By the time the text was announced four "unprejudiced" minds and willing hearts were ready to receive the Word as interpreted by the man they had come "to see."

He read the text from the great open Bible upon the cushion before him instead of from the written sheets he had laid beside it, and kept an index finger upon one point in the page throughout the introduction to the body of his discourse.

The tone in which the preface was spoken was rather conversational than oratorical, but the voice that had hypnotized Mr. Ford carried every syllable to the remotest corner of the building.

It was an eloquent sermon on what the Rev. Mr. Haile preferred to call "The Emphasized Petition"—"Forgive us our trespasses as we forgive them that trespass against us"—to which they listened with an intentness equalling that of Mr. Ford, and they were silent as they left the building after the minister's final sentences:

"The unforgiven affront, the wrong done to the mind, body or estate of neighbor or friend, to stranger or to those of your own blood—is a SIN in the sight of God that lies like a curse upon the unforgiving soul. I do not wonder that the man who nursed his grudges and watched hopefully for the moment of revenge, dared not utter the prayer for forgiveness. It would be denied before the words left his lips. The Judge has already spoken the sentence: "Neither will your Heavenly Father forgive your trespasses." There is no bill of exceptions to that decree."

"O my brothers who glory in nursing your wrath, let not another sun go down upon the unholy thing!"

A LITTLE incident marked the afternoon for two of the Committee and was reported with animation to their companions upon their return from a ramble through the residential districts of the town.

James MacArthur and Oscar Evans were upon the hotel veranda when two men coming from opposite directions chanced to meet within easy hearing of the New Yorkers. "Meet" would hardly have been the word to use, had not one of the pair been looking at something upon the other side of the street. For he shied abruptly as his eyes fell upon the man who halted in the middle of the sidewalk to confront the absent-minded pedestrian. The rubicund visage of the latter purpled and his hand grasped his cane with an upward motion that may or may not have been significant.

The other man laughed low and kindly: "Hello, Tom! I was just wishing I could meet you! May I walk back a little way with you?"

Without waiting for the reply, which would not have been an affirmative had it matched the flash of the eye and the compressed lips, the speaker thrust his arm through the stiff elbow that yielded not an inch to receive it and the two fell into step in the direction indicated. The last words overheard by the eavesdroppers were, "that sermon this morning—" With a chuckle that would have been a guffaw if the pedestrians had been out of hearing, the invariable hotel-porch lounge slid up to the two spectators.

"Gee! If that ain't something I never thought to see again! Them two hain't spoke to one another for nigh upon a year. Used to be great pals before that. Had a quarrel over a horse-trade, they say. And if Dick Long—that's the one who spoke first just now—hadn't been a church member, I guess there would have been a knock-down-and-drag-out fight. Both of 'em good fellows, too! I'm glad they've made it up!"

He slid into the bar as stealthily as he had come out. The New Yorkers exchanged glances. Then MacArthur winked knowingly and leaned over the porch-rail to gaze after the men who were moving slowly up the shaded street. The hand had not left the arm it had sought at the meeting of the estranged couple, but it rested easily there now, and Johnson was looking into his companion's face while he talked.

"Humph!" sighed the Scotchman. "Fair profits and quick returns. Eh?"

There's Always Romance and a Challenge in the Call of It

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

THERE'S a certain woman editor—rather famous as editors go—who invariably hangs the picture of a bit of open road leading to anywhere, or perhaps nowhere, over the desk at which she does her work. It isn't always the same picture—no, indeed—not any more than it's always the same desk. For she has a way of appearing—as famous editors sometimes do—first at one magazine office and then at another. You see, she is very much in demand!

Sometimes the picture is a sepia print—a photograph. Sometimes it's a little wash drawing or a pastel. Sometimes it's a fine etching, and sometimes it's the crudest sort of a pencil sketch. But always—though the angles from which they're taken are different—the soul of each picture is one and the same. Always the road meets your gaze in the picture's foreground and starts immediately to wind away until it is quite lost in the duskiest of the picture's background. Always there's a question in the call of it—a question as to where it's going, and where it will stop. One can't help wondering whether it will end vaguely, as many open roads do, or whether it will lead into a town or a city. One wonders if it will come, wearily, to rest at the door of a home, or whether its gallant way will be barred by a dancing river. One wonders if it will get lost in some forest, or if it will broaden in time, until it becomes a great highway.

IT WAS only after I had upon several occasions noticed the type of picture hanging over her desk, that I spoke about it to the famous woman editor.

"Why," I questioned, "do you always have the same sort of picture hanging over your desk? Doesn't the subject ever get—monotonous?" But even as I asked the question I knew what she was going to say.

The famous woman editor laughed softly, happily.

"Don't be a silly," she told me. "Of course it doesn't get monotonous. Why, maybe it's just a strange idea of mine, but I can't help feeling that my work would somehow lack its quota of inspiration if I didn't have such a picture to look at every once in so often. It seems to give me the desire to go on—just glancing at the picture of a road that's eternally going on! It gives me the thrill of adventure and the spur of imagination! There's always romance, and a challenge, in the call of it—always!"

I ventured another question—several questions.

"Feeling the way you do," I said slowly, "how can you bear to stay, year after year, at a desk? Knowing the call of romance and adventure, how can you possibly content yourself with the everyday routine of life? I should think that you'd want to throw your work to the four winds and go a-gypsying! I should think that you'd resent every moment spent in a definite place—sitting in an office, for instance, and doing editorial work! I should think that the lure of the open road would make you discontented!"

IT WAS then that the famous woman editor gave me her answer. It was an answer that I shall always remember. "Some of us," she said slowly, "are born to sit at desks. Some of us are filling our destinies by doing office work. Some of us can't go a-gypsying, no matter how often the road calls, nor how insistent that call may be. Some of us, with the throb of adventure in our hearts, must be content with make-believes. "I am one of the people who must be content with a make-believe. And my make-believe takes the form of a picture—the picture of a road that hasn't any end, so far as the picture is concerned. And by glancing at it once in a while, I can make myself see many beautiful things. And, because I can see them, I am sometimes able, through the magazines that I edit, to make others see them!" She paused for a moment, and then—

"For there are many others," she said, "who are chained, as I am, to work that they must do, and are glad to do—don't forget that! I don't resent my office and my desk, not a bit! It is to those others that I want to give the message of the open road—just as my picture gives it to me! It is to them—the ones who long for the far-off adventure—that I want to pass the eternal challenge!"

THE famous woman editor is right. There are many folk who are chained to work that keeps them in cities and offices and at desks when all of the time they are hearing the call of the open road—are listening to the lure of adventure and romance.

Some of them, like the famous woman editor, have found their avenue of escape. Sometimes, as in her case, it's by way of a picture. Sometimes it's to story-book land that they go. Sometimes it's the view from a window or a flower bed in some park. It may be in any of a hundred—or a thousand—ways, but the result is often the same. For if they've work to do, that work will be made finer and better by the inspiration that they get—and are able to transplant into the hearts of other folk.

Inspiration—it's the rhythm that the poetry of a world is written to! It's the background of history, the reason for the greatest books that are written, the spur that can make a life worth while. It's the oil that helps the wheels of commerce and industry and discovery and creation to turn smoothly. It's the silver lining to the darkest of clouds.

We all need our bit of inspiration—every one of us. It's the thing that keeps us going on—and that enables us to give of our strength and help and assurance to the ones who really require it. We all need our bit of inspiration, and yet some of us who are doing commonplace work, who are living our lives day by day, feel that we're missing it. And when we feel that way it's best to invent an avenue of escape—to plan brave, gallant adventures in the innermost depths of the soul.

Friends of mine, always—unless you belong to the fortunates who can go a-gypsying at will—have your avenue of escape! Don't allow yourselves to become dull from sitting at a desk, don't let your minds and imaginations grow dingy with the dust of an office or the smoke of a kitchen fire. Have your picture—or something else that will fully take the place of a picture—to go to for inspiration!

SONG

THE road is still as my heart is still,
It steals through the hollow and over the hill—
Steals o'er the hill and over the hollow,
Murmuring ever, "Come follow—follow!"

The road is narrow—it is not straight,
Shadows creep over it early and late;
Early and late do the shadows, creeping,
Ease my soul to a peaceful sleeping!

The sumac flames with a scarlet flame,
The soft wind whispers a well-loved name;
The woodbine quivers with crimson fire,
And wakes my eyes to a brave desire!

Youth may die . . . But the road still calls,
To the place where the last pale sunlight falls—
Murmuring ever, with turn and bend,
"Follow me on to the end—the end!"

Buying Real Estate Bonds

First Mortgage Securities Provide a Convenient and Safe Investment

THE real estate mortgage is the oldest form of investment. It is, in fact, nothing more or less than the written promise to pay by the owner of property. And this promise is made secure by a first mortgage on the property in question. The time in which payment is to be made is definite. The interest is at a fixed and specific rate.

First mortgage real estate bonds are simply units of a first mortgage. The reason for converting a real estate first mortgage into a number of units such as first mortgage real estate bonds is that this gives the investor with small sums to invest the opportunity to enjoy the same security advantages as the investor who has money enough to take over an entire first mortgage.

For the sake of clarity, let us assume that a man owns a building site worth $50,000 at conservative and experienced appraisal. He plans to erect a store building that will cost $100,000, making a total of $150,000. He has some money of his own, but not enough, so he goes to a first mortgage real estate bond company and arranges to give a first mortgage upon the land and building, in return for which the company agrees to advance him, say, $70,000. It is a good mortgage from an investment standpoint, because the $70,000 is secured by property which has a value of $150,000.

How can the ordinary investor be enabled to share in such safe investment? There is only one way, and that is by converting the first mortgage into $70,000 worth of first mortgage real estate bonds.

The usual plan is to issue bonds in denominations of $50, $100, $500, $1,000 and $5,000. If you buy a $50 bond your money will earn at the same rate and enjoy the same safety as the man who buys $50,000 worth of bonds.

REAL estate first mortgage bond companies of recognized standing do not recommend bond issues about which they are not completely satisfied. The present and future of their business rests solely upon their ability to provide issues of such safety that their customers will always be protected.

The greatest protection to the investor is in selecting a house of standing, and dealing with it. At the same time, as a matter of personal information, you ought to know this type of investment thoroughly. Any of the reputable companies will be glad to talk over with you your financial affairs and give you all the specific information you may desire, whether you wish to invest or not.

Another feature of these first mortgage bond issues is the serial reduction, which means that at certain specified dates the borrower will pay a specified amount toward the reduction of the obligation against his property. He is not allowed, however, to reduce his security.

Thus as time goes on the safety of the remaining bonds increases. The fact that the bonds are arranged to mature on successive dates is an added convenience to the investor, as it gives him a wide choice as to the length of time he wants to invest his money.

No charge is made to the holder of first mortgage real estate bonds for service rendered by the issuing company. As a matter of fact the issuing company regards the purchaser of its bonds as its client and represents his interest.

If at any time a holder of a first mortgage real estate bond issued by a reputable house desires to borrow money on it, he can do so by taking the bond to the company. Furthermore, all the houses of recognized standing undertake to maintain a market for all bonds they underwrite, thus giving their customers reasonable assurance of readily converting their bonds into cash.

Interest on the bonds is procured, in case the bonds are in coupon form, by sending the coupons to the issuing company or depositing them with the investor's bank.

So, far from being a technical transaction, the purchase of first mortgage real estate bonds is, in reality, a very simple transaction, and presents a very safe and secure field for the investor lacking wide experience.

How to Make the Most of Our Bibles

C. E. and B. Y. P. U. Psalms 19:7-14

KNOW rhetoric. The Bible is rich in figurative speech and Oriental imagery. Know geography. The country wherein an incident has taken place should be known, as well as the customs of the people, the modes of life peculiar to them and the epoch of the world's history with which the incident is connected. Know history. Trace the hand of God in the turning points of human progress. Own a copy of a good dictionary of the Bible for the proper interpretation of words. Consult a commentary for its light on difficult passages. Read the Bible reverently, humbly, attentively, honestly and prayerfully and read all the books about the Bible you can get your hands on.

Bible study is not only for the professional teacher or the man in the pulpit but for all occupants of the pews. The Bible is a very old book, nevertheless it is a very new book. Exploration and research, language study and, in fact, all worthy art and literature throw new light on the Bible. There are, of course, mysteries in the Bible, but there are mysteries everywhere. Not a phase of life is without its mystery. The world has not reached the limit of its progress. The last word of revelation has not been written and the final word of truth has not been spoken. "We know in part and we prophesy in part." There are many things in the Bible and out of the Bible that are perfectly plain. The Ten Commandments, the Golden Rule, our duty to God and neighbor, they are perfectly plain. He who lives in harmony with these ideals has a busy time of it and gets the most out of the Bible because he hitches the teaching with the task.

Student Echoes

THIS topic is designed for use by those who have attended an Epworth League Institute. Make this a report night. As the writer cannot discuss the topic for the reader because he does not know what the reader who has attended an Institute has heard or gained, he will tell a short but true story to point a moral.

Once there lived a very bright young woman in the place called "Epworthia." She was a graduate of the high school and of a select college for young women. Everybody predicted wonderful things for her future. She was sent as a delegate to an E. L. Institute and when she returned from this place of "Light and Leading" she made a brilliant report of all she had heard and seen. The young people were delighted. The next Sunday evening the E. L. met as usual. Ditto the next Sunday evening, and so on into the years. In the meantime, while the faithful worked hard to make the League a success the bright young woman was not among those present. Query: Why is an E. L. Institute? Answer: To train for leadership. If the moral of this paragraph has not been caught the reader is directed to go over it again.

Paul in Athens

International Sunday-School Lesson for September 11
Acts 17:16-34

By REV. SAMUEL D. PRICE, D. D.

CITY people need the blessed Gospel as well as those who are at a distance from some metropolitan center. Athens was no exception in spite of the fact that she boasted of her culture. It is always very important to know the things which will have a permanent value. Many will turn to the dictionary when they must have an extended definition of "Epicurean" and "Stoic" whereas "Jesus," whom Paul preached is becoming better known every day. People do not go to Athens today even for "culture," except as they wish to study ruins which are ages old.

Paul left Silas and Timothy with the scripture-searching Bereans, and soon arrived at Piraeus, the port of Athens. The two places were joined for the 4½ miles with double walls 550 feet apart and 60 feet wide. Even this approach contained many idol-statues, and when the city was reached Paul was appalled at the number of idols that were found everywhere. Then there was the great statue of Athena, the Acropolis with the wonderful Parthenon, and all else that has made Athens the place of study for the artist and the classical student.

Lonesomeness may have been one of the reasons why Paul asked his escort from Berea to Athens to speed Silas and Timothy on their way to him. While waiting he was busy for his Master, for he held a commission for ceaseless service and now was always the opportune time for him regardless of where he might be. The more Paul goes about the city of many philosophies the more is he "provoked." It is interesting to note what stirs people to indignation and action. Lincoln saw a girl sold as a slave on that old block in New Orleans and he was so "provoked" that eventually he was able to write an effective Emancipation Proclamation. Some boys will laugh when they tie a tin can to a dog's tail. Others are "provoked" to befriend the dog and even teach the boys by the wayside.

The Jehovah worshippers were first sought out by Paul. They, too, had much to learn, for they knew not the Son of God as a personal Saviour. Whatever he did must be attended to quickly, for he had not planned for any extended sojourn in this city of pagan intellectuals. Their own method of address is accepted by Paul, and he seems to reason and discuss matters with them, rather than preach to them in a more formal manner. We soon find him daily in the market-place. If the church in the homeland was only more eager to reach those who need the gospel message its members would follow Paul in the matter of market-place preaching. Much the same people come to church each Sunday, and many of these have not practised last Sunday's sermon sufficiently. Parks and street corners offer unlimited opportunities for sowing the gospel seed. Here, again, is a most fruitful field of activity for any organized adult class. The singing, or even playing, of a familiar hymn will help to gather an audience quickly. The spoken message must, of course, be a real one, and it is a great test for any public speaker to observe the way in which he can hold attention for a few moments. These fall days are golden with opportunities for this type of work.

IN THESE modern days of moving-picture censorship we can understand how Paul passed his censors' examination in Athens. He was finally invited by the Areopagus, meeting on Mars Hill, to give a more formal statement concerning Jesus and the Resurrection. Some think that the Athenians so confused the resurrection as to think that Paul was declaring another person. This formal summons does not disturb the man with a message. It gives him the best occasion he has had since coming to Athens. As Paul speaks he is surrounded by intellect, art and history.

It will be very profitable to study this address as it is expounded in the various lesson helps and commentaries to which you have access. Paul follows the well-known rule in pedagogy of going from the known to the unknown. His point of contact is the familiar inscription on one of their local altars. He uses this to present God the Father to the members of the Areopagus. The great truth is not shaded to harmonize with the mental attitude of his audience. Paul might be a barbarian in the eyes of that select group, but he would teach to win them to his God. Today, as then, non-Christian philosophies have no place for the elimination of the penalty for sin. They laughed at the Resurrection and said "No," but the fact remains that it IS. "Isms" of the day please many who still have itching ears for some novelty, and meanwhile sin holds the sinner slave-bound. Those who deny the Atonement accomplished by Jesus Christ cannot obtain salvation.

When a modern preacher calls his audience ignorant, it is incumbent on him immediately to become their teacher and present worth-while facts. This is the very thing that Paul did. He declared for one God in a city where there were more gods than any could recount. This great God was the only Creator and is a spirit to be worshipped directly and without graven device. They had been wrong in their premise and practise and yet this God was so loving that He would overlook what had been done if now they would repent and seek Him, with all the attendant blessings. Paul announced the facts of the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man; he then "drew the net." Every Sunday-school teacher must make the personal appeal in teaching the lesson. Remember another familiar rule in pedagogy: Impression must lead to expression.

SOME ridiculed and others procrastinated, but there were a few converts. The named converts show again that the Gospel is equally for everyone; a member of the Areopagus and a woman. Paul surely gained his two D's that day. It was well worth being mocked by the august censors if he could win Dionysius and Damaris. Would that every sermon preached on this blessed Sunday could, under the power of the Spirit, obtain like results—two converts! As listeners to sermons each one of us has a right to ask ourselves, at least, the question: "Why was that sermon preached?"

There is no record of any persecutions while in Athens, neither is there any Epistle to the Athenians. The city is soon left to her idols as Paul goes to Corinth, where he is rejoined by Timothy, who was sent back from Athens to Thessalonica. There are some who think that Paul regretted his sermonic method before the Areopagus as being an intellectual effort in view of the mental reputation of his hearers. There is no record that he ever repeated that particular sermon. Then there is a most emphatic declaration in his first letter to the church at Corinth, to which place he went immediately after leaving Athens. He wrote, I Corinthians 2:1-2, "And I, brethren, when I came unto you, came not with excellency of speech or of wisdom, proclaiming unto you the testimony of God. For I determined not to know anything among you, save Jesus Christ and Him crucified."

Students will soon enter upon their college courses for another year of intensive study. This fact should not be overlooked by superintendents and teachers. Special mention, personally and in prayer, should be made. If their life-work has not been chosen, this lesson offers an unusually good opportunity to set before them the blessedness of missionary service. Had Paul been the chief tent merchant of his day he would not have accomplished as much as he did by becoming the apostle to the Gentiles.

Burglars Don't Seek The Limelight

DARKNESS is their stock in trade. They work by stealth—unheard and unseen—their movements cloaked in secrecy. It's honest folks that seek the light. They are the only ones who can risk it.

It's the same way in business. The manufacturer who is not sure of his goods does not dare to advertise. Advertising would hasten the end of his business career—put him to a test he could not meet.

The manufacturer who advertises, deliberately invites your inspection. He tells you about his product and then lets it stand on its own merits. You can depend on him. He knows his product is good.

That's one reason why it pays you to read the advertisements. It is through advertising that you are able to keep in touch with the good things that progressive business men are spending their money to introduce and to keep before you.

Advertisements are interesting, instructive and profitable. They throw a powerful light on the very things that concern you most. Read them.

Questions and Answers

MRS. S. M., Enola. The passage in James 2:19 must be read in connection with the preceding and following verses to get the right interpretation. The apostle, in verses 17 and 18, drew the distinction between a living and active faith which is followed by works, and a faith which, being without works, is dead. Then he gives an extreme illustration, saying that even the evil spirits believed, but theirs was a belief which, though it made them fear and tremble, produced no other results; for while they shudder at the thought of God, their hearts remain full of wickedness and sin and rebellion against Him. "Their belief or faith," writes one commentator, "only adds to their torment at the thought of ultimately meeting justice at His hands." So with the faith in a man's heart that does not seek to prove itself in works. It is not the faith of love, but of fear, distrust, indifference—a faith which his own perverse unwillingness does not permit to bear fruit in the works of repentance that prove the genuineness of his conviction, and which should flow from it. (See Philippians 2:12.) Faith, to justify us, must from the first include obedience. If it be a real, justifying faith, it will bear fruit; if not, it ceases to live.

Mrs. M. C. R., Douglas, Wyo. The matter should be submitted to a reputable lawyer. No one else can advise you or safeguard your interests.

H. P. M., Olney, Pa., writes: "As a subscriber and reader of the Christian Herald, let me tell thee how our family enjoys its helpful presentation of Christianity and its evangelical teaching. I enclose a leaflet by a converted Jew, who has joined our Orthodox Friends (Quakers), and is himself a preacher of rare power. He has recently returned from Germany, where he was born, and where he felt a call to proclaim peace principles. He found many hearts responsive in Berlin and the provinces."

M. R., Providence, R. I. The only estimate of the amount of relief needed to deal effectively with the Russian famine is that published in Populaire, a Paris newspaper which states that approximately 2,880,000,000 pounds of wheat will be required. This, to be distributed in the ten provinces affected, would call for transportation in 400 ships or 150,000 freight cars, the cost of delivery and distribution being approximately 1,300,000,000 francs. These figures are estimates said to be based on official information.

W., Chicago, writes: "At the Bible Class (where I am a member) when the seats are all occupied, some of the members place their Bibles on the floor, and seem offended when I tell them it shows disrespect for the Word of God. Such a thing would not be seen in a heathen land, where the native converts treasure their Bible as their most valuable thing, and carefully wrap it in a cloth and carry it in their bosom. Do you not think our Christianity is lacking in proper respect for the Bible, the House of God and the Sabbath?"

Such a custom as you describe certainly does show disrespect for God's Word. The Bible Class should have either book rests or desks, or at least some place on which to lay their Bibles. Why not bring the matter up, in a tactful way, and see whether proper accommodation can not be furnished?

Missionary A. Pearson of 108 Plein Street, Johannesburg, the Transvaal, South Africa, writes: "I am exceedingly grateful to the numerous donors throughout the States who have responded to my appeal for Christian literature which you so kindly inserted in your valuable journal. I would esteem it a great favor should you embody this in the Christian Herald, as it will not be possible for me to reply to them all individually, although I regret it. These gifts of religious literature are very much appreciated by our people, and will certainly be most helpful. I need hardly say that more of this kind would prove quite acceptable, and I can assure you in advance of a diligent and widespread use of it. I recommend the special features of the books, so as to awaken their sympathies and excite their interest, to the end that they may study them carefully and ask questions concerning them. By such means a way may be opened for holding evangelistic services where they are most needed. I go everywhere by turns, to all nationalities, to whites, colored and black folks."

Mrs. E. C. Cort of Chieng Mai, Siam, desires to express to the readers of the Christian Herald her sincere thanks for the hearty response to her request a few months since for pictures, etc., to be used in the work at Chieng Mai. Because of the large expenditure necessary for inland postage on these pictures, Mrs. Cort now requests that any friends desiring to contribute further will kindly send their gifts to her at North Canton, Ohio, whence they will be forwarded to the field by freight.

Observer, St. Petersburg, Fla., writes: "Some time ago I suggested to a country minister that if he could not get his people out on Sundays, he might mail them each a sermonette on a postal card. Now, can you tell me if such postal cards are produced anywhere? Sermonettes fit for special occasions and also regular weekly occasions might be put on sale with room for the pastor's signature. By doing this, Uncle Sam could be made useful in spreading the Gospel."

Rev. E. F. M., Amber, Pa., writes: "In your issue of July 16 C. O. M., Trenton, N. J., rates the Christian Herald very high. If this good friend wants a small book of which it is safe to say that it is 'next to the Bible,' let him procure from the Sunday School Union, Hodge's 'Way of Life.' It was written by Prof. Charles Hodge, at the special request of the union that he would write a book which might lead intelligent young persons to the Saviour."

Mrs. H. T., Harpersfield, N. Y. The song you desire is not in our collection.

Mrs. H. A. S., Lynnvile, Iowa. The oldest manuscripts make the passage in 1 Cor. 7:38 read "his own virgin daughter," the point at issue being as to whether she should or should not marry, and what the parental attitude should be in the case. As Paul explains in verse 25 of the same chapter, this special advice which he gives to the church in Corinth is not laid down as by law or inspiration, but as the apostle's best judgment or opinion—a recommendation and not a command.

Any reader of the Christian Herald knowing the address of Wesley DeWitt (about 63 years of age and formerly of Ohio,) will confer a great favor by communicating with Mrs. James Miller, Russell, Kansas.

Mrs. A. B., Alsen, N. Dak. The Kingdom of God, as Jesus told us, cometh not with observation. Its coming is sure, and has already begun in the hearts of millions who today worship and serve in that Kingdom. As to the growth of the Kingdom, there can be no doubt, nor is there any in the hearts of those who "walk in the Light." From the first little gathering of true believers (Acts 1:15) the 120 souls have steadily increased, in the face of all obstacles and persecutions, until today they form the greatest army ever known, including (nominally at least) nearly one-third of the human race now living. We are mailing you some statistics from the latest religious census of the world, the figures being of course approximate, as none but the One who "seeth the hearts of men" can judge in such a matter.

A. W. G., Vevay, Ind. 1. The question as to Paul's membership of the Sanhedrin can not be definitely settled. According to Maimonides, and the Jerusalem "Gemara," it was required of all who became members of that Council that they should be married. There is no evidence in the New Testament to show that Paul was married, and his frequent advocacy of celibacy would seem to show that he had remained single by preference, in order that he might be free to follow his apostolic career. Acts 26:10 has been interpreted by some authorities as implying membership, and by others as meaning that he simply was commissioned by the Council to carry on the program of persecution against the Christians. 2. Your second question will receive attention later.

The Call of the Bells

THORWALDSEN'S STATUE OF THE CHRIST

No work of the famous Danish sculptor is more eloquently expressive than his statue of the Christ, which stands in Copenhagen and is one of the greatest art treasures of his native city. In marvelous fashion the figure achieves his life purpose of reproducing the ideal beauty of ancient statuary but ennobled by the influences of Christianity. Thorvaldsen has been dead for more than three-quarters of a century, but the conception of the Son of God which he carved into marble will carry its message of understanding and comfort to many generations.

The Every-Day Mission of the Church

IT HAS become a community institution somewhat different from what we used to think of as a church, a dignified other-world structure standing with closed doors beside a graveyard. It is a living force and has become a part of the everyday possession of the whole people.

Do you imagine that it can serve the very life of the country in this manner and not find a response? Is it possible on a large scale to give full measure, shaken down and pressed together and running over without some of it pouring back into your bosom?

—Rev. Silas E. Persons, Cazenovia, N. Y.

SAINTE BENEDICT, destined to become one of the greatest figures of Christian history, one day heard a voice from Heaven, saying, "The true servant of God is he who serves man best." Thereupon, he laid aside his hair shirt and other means of self-mortification, and going down from the mountain fastnesses where he had led a life of constant prayer, he began his ceaseless efforts to raise the social, moral, mental, political, and spiritual ideals of his time. Before many years, he was head of twelve monasteries. The most promising of the land's youth was brought to him to be educated. Great kings sought his council. Women prisoners of war for the first time in the history of the world were, at his behest, accorded humane treatment. A general sense of social justice began to prevail.

The mission of the modern church is not unlike that of Saint Benedict. It also has accepted the challenge to serve. It has accepted the truth that weakness, not godliness, prompts withdrawal from active participation in the affairs of a world struggling against injustices and inequalities. Consequently more and more we hear of churches the country over embarking upon every-day programs for better citizenship; engaging themselves in social activities; presenting public lectures, motion pictures and drama; and conducting playgrounds and gymnasiums. To the question of what the church can possibly have to do with things as widely removed from the spiritual life as movies and swimming meets—and the question is asked pointedly every day—the leaders truly alive to the spirit of the times reply with another question:

The Challenge to Wider Service

By MARTHA CANDLER

"Can we not thus best counteract the results of the immoral, degrading, or at best time-wasting commercial amusements which are too often the only means of recreation offered the youth of our city streets?" Or again, "Can we afford not to arouse and stimulate the unused facilities of the boys and girls of our rural communities, and develop in them the social potentialities through which eventually must be solved the problem of keeping them down on the farm, to quote the words of the popular song?"

DURING the war we gained many lessons in human nature, not the least of them being that formerly our regular army soldiers were "hard boiled" because they had been forced into a hard-boiled environment. Organized recreation for the Army taught us that "Fight hard and play hard, and come through clean!" was a much more apt truism than the old "Fight hard, drink hard and go to the Devil!" had been.

If a more recent example were needed of the impulse of young people when given the choice in recreation, to choose the cleaner, there is an outstanding example in New York City, "where the true social spirit grows slowest." Three nights each week during the entire season an inspiring band concert has been given on the campus at Columbia University. Even through the lull before summer school began, the crowds averaged 15,000 a night, the population of a good-sized town! children, particularly young people, from all the boroughs flocked there. And they did more than passively enjoy. In every case, they had compiled with the preliminaries of getting a season ticket. They voluntarily joined in supporting and prolonging the season!

SUCH a thing would have seemed impossible a few years ago. "The youth of New York wants his selfish pleasure!" people would always say. "He wants his cabaret, his dance-hall, his billiard-room of questionable repute." And yet, a free concert out-rides in attendance a summer amusement park of the sort that only New York could produce!

It goes to show that something definite has been happening in New York as well as in Walla Walla, Wash. We have embarked upon an era of communal life, communal recreation, communal business enterprises, and even communal spiritual endeavor. Everywhere there is an intense urge to participate, to mingle, to enter into the pursuits in which the group rather than the individual profits. The country life movement, now of a number of years growth, is a part of it. The school social center is another. Many of the new state university extension courses in leadership of all sorts have been inspired by it. Gradually it has brought about the widest possible use of all public facilities in the interest of the community as a whole.

It is a great, almost an unparalleled opportunity recognized alike by the Federal Government and by the great national social agencies—for the church to step forward and assume leadership alike in this movement in the rural community and in the great city. By reason of the strength of its organization, its breadth of appeal, and the undisputed place it holds in the intimate confidence of the people, the average church has here an opportunity, a responsibility, which it can ill afford to overlook.

So ripe is the time for the community ministry, that the church which turns understandingly to the task cannot fail. "We have tried all along the way," writes

AN INCREASING proportion of the letters from our readers ask questions or advice about enlarging the community activities of the local church. The problem is one that is pressing heavily on most cities and towns, especially as it related to the young people. Deeply appreciating its importance, we asked Martha Candler, associated with Community Service, Inc., and one of the outstanding authorities on social and welfare activities, to prepare a series of articles, of which this is the first, under the general title "The Everyday Mission of the Church."

one minister, responsible for one of the country's oldest and most admirable rural church-community programs—and his utterances might be set down as the cardinal principle of all such organization—"we have tried all along the way to develop a fine spirit of co-operation. We have studiously avoided giving the impression that we are doing something for somebody. We have cultivated the feeling that we are all working together for the common good. Every committee we have is on its mettle, made to feel that the success of the entire enterprise depends upon its particular efforts.

"Let me say," he adds, "that we never planned to do the work we are doing, or even a tenth part of it. We started in to serve, and made no stipulation, and offered no hint about recompense or reward. For a year or two, not very hearty appreciation seemed to be shown by the communities we served. But keep pouring in human kindness, and by and by the heart will be touched and respond. Isn't our religion one of faith? And a part of that faith in the human nature that the Almighty has made?"

"I have found out what a lot of good 'bad folks' there are in the world; generosity where you least looked for it, friendliness and appreciation and response and co-operation where you never dreamed of finding them, doors that were literally closed to you opening up with warm hospitality, indifference changing to interest, and the whole country, once uncommunicative, distant, suspicious, taking on a smile of glad recognition and friendliness. It is a winning of the country back to its church and its God!" Is not that a worthy aid for the church to set for itself?

REV. J. W. F. DAVIES of the Congregational Church of Winnetka, Ill., has for a number of years been the executive head of one of the most successful community Houses in the country, in addition to his regular pastoral work, having "felt his way out toward larger and larger activities."

At the outset, he made inquiry into how the Sunday-school boys and girls spent their leisure hours. He found that their time free from day school was occupied in ways derogatory to their best development. He knew that the most ideal Sunday-school hour his institution could evolve would be far short of counteracting the languid influences which he found running through the too abundant hours of unoccupied leisure. His answer was a recreational program which would turn his pupils' recess from study into a physical, mental, and spiritual asset.

Once started, the work "just grew." The programs worked out by Mr. Davies and his various committees were based on the mass and group plans. Gymnasium classes formed for boys and girls soon expanded to take in men and women. Tennis, baseball, volley ball, and other athletics for men and boys, with clubs for girls, followed. Boy Scouts, Camp Fire Girls, hikers' clubs, study groups, debating societies, crowded on each others' heels. During the war, through its sound social organization in the Community House, Winnetka made a splendid showing. A club of the housemaids of the town came together almost spontaneously to spend their leisure hours in patriotic causes, and have stayed together since, for dramatics, musical and varied other activities.

A regular motion-picture entertainment two evenings a week is self-supporting, and permits of the free showing of especially selected films in connection with the Pleasant Sunday Evenings which, from the beginning, have been a part of the programs. The church activities developed almost automatically into a community-wide social organization. Its work is now carried on by a board, of which Mr. Davies is director, with representatives from every church, educational and public welfare organization, and with full use of all recreational facilities at the town's disposal. Leadership for the more and more complex phases of the organization is almost entirely volunteer now, having been trained as the work has gone on. This is the ideal everywhere, for every community has within itself potential leadership for a full outfit of activities—leadership such as only organization will bring out.

IN RUTLAND, Vt., there is a more recent but almost equally successful example of a community-wide program conducted by a parish. The Congregational Church, under Rev. Arthur H. Bradford, has for a number of years conducted clubs and classes, which, by the breadth of their appeal, have drawn enormous followings. It was, therefore, natural when former Governor Mead decided it was time to establish a community center for all the people that he should have chosen that church and that minister to great city, has saved more than one soul from desperation in the past trying year. But that is only one of its services. It maintains clubs and classes for young men and young women. It has its amateur dramatic groups, its cafeteria, its housing project.

THE Calvary Presbyterian Church of Buffalo is one body which has discovered that only by laying down its life it has found it. Calvary was closing her doors after a fifteen-year struggle against a changing condition which had carried its congregation to far distant parts of the city. It had been left in the midst of a section which could not support a Presbyterian church, and which did not seem to need one. But the minister had that faith which dies hard, and with it the conviction that he had still a work to do through this large and splendidly equipped church plant, even if it were in the midst of a population made up of Catholics and of Jewish people and of Protestants whose church-going impulses were below par.

"I asked myself the old question, 'who is my neighbor?'" the minister relates. "I decided that the ministry of Christ was largely a community ministry, and that there could be no higher calling for Calvary than in the enriching of the lives of those around it through providing for their leisure hours those things which in the neighborhood were unheard of."

With the co-operation of the Community Service director and the Buffalo Presbytery, therefore, the church embarked upon its community work. It opened a noon-time cafeteria and social hour. It started six o'clock suppers followed by another social hour. Club activities were organized for young men and women of all ages and tastes. Supervised play and games were introduced daily during the after-school hours. Afternoon and evening gymnasium classes were formed, and a men's athletic league developed. In response to repeated demands, and encouraged by the financial returns on the cafeteria (which is operated on a so-called "non-profit," or a 6 per-cent. basis, the minister is taking steps to transform the palatial old manse into a home-club for the working girls of the district.

The Sunday services, which formerly averaged fifteen in attendance, now attract large crowds. The Sunday evening services alone would seem to justify the whole project. Popular religious songs, appropriate moving pictures, and short talks (to all of which admission is free) pack the assembly hall to the doors. Calvary church has become self-supporting, self-respecting, and full of the red blood of life. Its ministry is making life more worth living for the hundreds and thousands of people of its neighborhood. And this when it would otherwise have been sold, and turned to some anti-social end.

THE one important factor in all of these examples of the community ministry is that real, and not fancied needs are being met, and that they do not duplicate work already being adequately done. In his book on "Recreation and the Church," Herbert Wright Gates has a chapter on "Studying the Needs of the Community" which is worthy of serious study by all interested in church social organization. The Playground and Recreation Association of America, 1 Madison Avenue, New York, also furnishes information on the study of the community, and the making of surveys. Community Service, 1 Madison Avenue, New York, has a definite policy of church co-operation, and wherever it has a local staff, will lend its services not only in the matter of the preliminary survey, but in the actual organization of activities. The Y. M. C. A., the Y. W. C. A., and school officials can also lend valuable assistance in this field in which they often had especial training.

Financial campaigns, paid personnel, even elaborate equipment will seldom be necessary for initiating the average program. In communities from coast to coast, people by the hundreds and the thousands are in all reverence flocking to movie shows, concerts,

The minister, if you give him a chance, makes a pretty good umpire for the wholesome play activities which the church may offer to the children take charge of it. His gift of a large three-story brick clubhouse and a separate gymnasium was made over to the church, with the minister as executive director.

"There are no Y. M. C. A. or Y. W. C. A. organizations in this city," Mr. Bradford says. "Moreover our schools have no gymnasium facilities. Hence, our opportunity is very great. Our members come from practically all the churches of the city, both Catholic and Protestant—the social activities of the young people of the community are centering here to a large degree."

It was the Woman's Guild of the First Presbyterian Church of Bloomfield, N. J., which, through its wise and unselfish use of an extraordinarily well-equipped parish hall, was responsible for community organization in that locality. It was they, chiefly, who sponsored the movement which resulted in the purchase of a $300,000 community building there to be dedicated as a soldiers' memorial. They had the conviction about the possibilities for social service through a physical center, and they had imbued the other citizens of the city with the same conviction.

It is not possible to recount the instances or even mention the names of the hundreds and thousands of

Conspicuous among them, however, is the Union Methodist Church in the heart of New York's brightest lighted theatrical section. # Choosing Tools for India

Sometimes the Most Modern Implements Are Not the Most Effective

SAHARANPUR—a woman in America pronounced it "Sarah-Ann-poor"—is a city in northern India with a population of 62,850, an important railroad center, and the seat of one of the famous botanical gardens of India. The city was founded in 1340, and the shrine of Shah Haran Shishti, from whom its name is derived, is still visited by tourists. One of the famous mosques of India, patterned after the great mosque of Delhi, is located here.

American Protestant missionary work in Saharanpur is committed to the Presbyterians, and the missionary compound is the second largest compound I have thus far seen in India. My escorts were not able to give me the exact figures. One said forty, one said fifty and another eighty acres. Even if the smallest figure is taken 40 acres within the city limits of such a city is a majestic figure, and was alone made possible by reason of the early date, 1835, at which the mission was established.

Here is located the Presbyterian Theological Seminary, Church, Training School for Wives of Seminary Students, Industrial School and Orphanage, City Girls' School, and Leper Asylum, and from it as a center is carried on city and district evangelism.

Saharanpur is noted for its annual convention of Christian workers held primarily for spiritual uplift and attended by representatives of all evangelical denominations. One year ago 1,000 were present, and the chief speakers were Sherwood Eddy, Congregationalist, and E. Stanley Jones, Methodist. The management is Presbyterian and the Presbyterian church has from year to year furnished speakers of the first rank.

As an illustration of the development of native leadership, we may point to the Rev. B. B. Roy, a convert from Hinduism who once sought peace at Hardwar, one of the famous Hindu sacred places on the Ganges, only to be disgusted. He served as the acting principal of the Theological Seminary while Dr. H. C. Velte, the principal was in the United States. Mr. Roy is the author of a Commentary on Acts and of a book on Christian work for village workers. Mrs. Roy is in charge of the Training School for the Wives of Seminary Students, numbering 21, mothers of 45 children, who must also be cared for while the fathers are studying for the ministry. The Seminary had 33 students during the year 1919-1920.

THE use of both Indian and American tools might be applied in a spiritual sense to all the methods of the station, for there is a constant effort to relate Western ideals and methods to the thought and life of India. We, however, had in mind the practice in the Industrial School, one of the most significant departments at the mission station, and one that stands side by side with the Theological Seminary in working for the redemption of India, for the physical salvation of the people must keep pace with their spiritual and literary culture. At the time of my visit the Seminary students had just left for their vacation period, but the industrial students, who are to help in creating a new India, were busy at work.

The first young men we came to were sawing boards from a log. The saw was of Indian design, but a decided improvement over others I have seen in use in my travels. In the absence of a circular saw, such as is used in American planing mills, it did the work well but slowly. The spicy odor of the sawdust aroused my curiosity, and I found that the boys were working on a log of Cedar of Lebanon.

The toes do their share in the manipulation of this Indian turning lathe

The plain box held by Superintendent Borup yields the profits, but the other shows the beautiful work the pupils can do

Sawing a log into boards, native style, at the Saharanpur Industrial School

By
Rev. W. B. NORTON, Ph.D.

A more curious device was the bit which a young man was driving through a log by means of a cord twisted around the bit in such a way that he could make it whirl.

But most curious of all was the Indian turning lathe. When I saw the simple tools I could not imagine how they could be made to do such a difficult feat as the turning of a carved table leg or a chair round. Here was a machine in which a man's arm, assisted by a strong cord twisted around the spindle, was the motor power and where a man's toes were utilized in holding the chisel which did the cutting.

The use of the adz displayed the skill resulting from long practice. It was marvelous with what nicety and accuracy the worker could "hew to the line and let the chips fall where they might." Timbers were squared, surfaces smoothed, and knots trimmed in a way I think would have astonished an American carpenter.

WHY do you spend time teaching these primitive methods?" I asked the superintendent, the Rev. C. Borup, who is a practical mechanic as well as a true minister of the gospel.

The question gave the sturdy Dane, for such he is, the chance he wanted to impress on his American visitors the fundamental principle on which his entire industrial program is built.

"Our reason is a practical, bread-and-butter one," he said. "Unless our boys learn Indian methods they cannot go out and teach others. A still more imperative reason is that American and European tools, being imported, are expensive, and our boys are poor. If we send them out of our school with a knowledge of only foreign tools and methods, they cannot set up shops of their own, for they cannot buy the tools. With Indian tools and methods they are ready on graduation to go to work at once and as they earn money they can add to their equipment the more modern tools, for with all the ingenuity of the tools and methods handed down from father to son through India's long history, they are far inferior to those produced by America and Europe."

Mr. Borup then conducted us to a room where he had patterns of the finest hand-carving in hard woods. He showed us the several stages from mathematical figures to intricate floral designs worthy to adorn the palace of a Maharaja. After we had expressed our liveliest admiration for these evidences of skill and artistic taste he led us to the open verandah.

"Now," he said with a twinkle in his eye, "I will show you the real thing." Whereupon he held aloft a plain wooden box made from boards cut by an American-style gig-saw made in the school, and put together with a common American hammer and nails.

"This is the only thing it really pays us to make," he continued. "These boxes we make for the government and are for the purpose of shipping plants from our famous botanical gardens." His face grew sad as he described the conditions which have made it necessary to abandon the carving of the beautiful art patterns and take up the pounding together of common wooden boxes or crates.

"Prices on wood carving have not kept pace with the high cost of living," he said. "The fathers of our boys could live on three annas, ten cents, a day. Our boys can't live on less than twelve annas a day and yet the public wants to buy carved woods at the same old price. It is this and this alone which has compelled the substitution of the utilitarian for the artistic."

Speaking again of the botanical gardens which make the demand for the wooden boxes, it is interesting to note that three years ago there was celebrated the cen-

CHAPTER IV

By MARION HARLAND

Illustrated by William C. McNulty

"I DON'T know who called October the 'golden-mouthed St. John—the St. Chrysostom among the twelve apostles of the year,' but I am his grateful debtor for putting the beautiful conceit into words. I say it to myself every day like this."

Stuart Haile said it dreamily, gazing over the garden fence into the street now glorious with the double row of rock-maples, all a-glow with crimson and gold.

"Our world was never lovelier than now," responded the wife, holding up for his inspection a broad shallow basket of superb yellow chrysanthemums which she had just gathered.

There were no finer in the region, and she was justly proud of them.

"And you were never in better shape for enjoying it! I thought—as I saw you busy clipping them, in your white dress and looking absurdly youthful and pretty for a matron of twelve years standing—of Ruth—as 'she stood breast-high amid the corn.' It was a charming symphony of white-and-gold."

"And you are altogether charming in not thinking your poetic fancies wasted upon your everyday wife! You never said a prettier thing than that, my darling. The golden day must have inspired you."

"Combined with the appreciation of a hundred other blessings that crown my days. I would not exchange my lot for that of any other man alive. Don't weary of hearing me say it! I mean it more and more every day."

His arm was about the shapely waist. The gorgeous drapery of the woodbine which was the interpinning of the palings shut them out from the sight of chance passers-by. Not that they would have cared had the caress become village gossip. He was deeply in love with his own wife, and his people knew and liked it. She put up her lips for his good-bye kiss.

"Anna Smith is to call by for these on her way to Mrs. Bates's. It is her day for going to see her, you know. It does her good to have a few words with the blessed old saint. She is a living sermon to me."

HE CARRIED away with him a picture he was to recollect for many a day afterward. The spacious "cottage" embosomed in yellowing elms and canopied by running roses and oglantine, stood out clearly against the cloudless October sky. The deep eaves overhanging the second-story windows were streaked here and there between the long slender shingles with a "delicate tracery of moss." He laughed low to himself in recalling her phrase and that "if one made believe very hard it might be mistaken for thatch."

Bright-hearted, whole-souled creature that she was! Had she any just appreciation of what part she had in making his life "as round and perfect as a star"?

He met the postman at the first corner below the Parsonage.

"All the mail is for you, sir," the man said. "I might as well hand it to you now, without going on to the house."

Haile slipped the batch into his pocket without examination of the superscriptions. When he reached the church-study—a neat building jutting out from the back of the main edifice—he shook the mail loose upon the table. So slight was his concern respecting it that he let the letters lie untouched while he lifted a vase of wall-flowers from the middle of the table and inhaled the fragrance deliberately.

"Ah-h-h! I know from what garden they came! She is very kind to remember how fond I am of wall-flowers."

The sexton had a pass-key to the study and his wife was a skillful amateur florist. Several times each week he found here tokens of her thoughtful recollection of the pastor's tastes and a desire to gratify them. It was a way his "people" had, and one of many that proved the might of his hold upon their affections. "Just what I was saying!" he commented aloud after one last long inhalation of the favorite aroma. "My cup runneth over!"

Three of the four letters were advertising circulars. He opened the unsealed envelopes while standing, and tossed all into the waste-basket. The fourth was a square envelope and thick to the touch. A glance at the address drew forth an ejaculation of pleasure. He cut open the flap and sat down to read the contents.

"A coincidence!" He spent so many solitary hours in this sanctum that the habit of soliloquizing had grown upon him.

"Here's a coincidence! I was thinking this morning of the document. Haile used the word to himself in laying the paper flat upon the table and smoothing out the creases. Somehow Dr. Calvin Barrows of the Blank Avenue Church, New York City, imparted a documentary air to whatever he set his hand unto. The very creases in the sheet were superbly defined and evidently set hard by a metal folder held by a heavy hand.

"My dear Haile:

"Without preliminaries I come at once to the subject of this communication.

"I have just had a conference with four officials of the Banner Church, New York, with reference to a call to that pulpit, recently made vacant by the resignation of Rev. Samuel Stenson, D.D.

"By a unanimous vote of the session and the trustees and members of the church it was decided that a call be extended to you to become the pastor. Committees having the matter in hand have made it their business to hear you preach upon more than one occasion and to acquaint themselves with your qualifications. Before, however, putting the call into your hands, it was deemed expedient to consult me, whom they knew to be your warm personal friend, with regard to the probable effect of the call upon your views and inclinations.

"I told them frankly that while I was not in your confidence regarding such matters, I knew of nothing that would impede your action in the present case, and I did not disguise my hope that a connection that seemed eminently desirable for all parties concerned might be formed without unnecessary delay. I found that they had looked over your present field quite thoroughly and more diplomatically than I should have thought possible, judging from the anxiety manifested by the men who waited upon me. They were sure that none of your present parishioners suspected their object in occasional visits to Marlinton, and inquiries made to citizens in and out of your church membership.

"They were openly delighted at what they had picked up regarding your work in and out of the pulpit. As one of their elders, a Scotchman by birth, expressed it: 'He has cultivated the farm well. I don't believe there's a weed left in a fence-corner anywhere.'

"Am I presuming upon our friendship in venturing to advise you to give the matter long and mature deliberation before replying in the negative? You are especially happy in your present relations with the Marlinton church and community. I have watched your career there with lively, and even affectionate satisfaction. But, my dear boy, (you are more than a dozen years my junior, recollect!) your talents and now your experience and success qualify you for a wider sphere of activity. You have, as the canny Scot put it, tilled the farm admirably. Your successor will find the office far easier than you have found it. A younger man and a less skillful manager of men than you have proved yourself to be can take hold and run the business. To borrow a military term, all that you do now and for years to come in the respectable old town will be only marking time. To keep at the exercise is a waste of power and opportunities.

"You will receive marching orders and for the front almost as soon as you get this. You are too good a soldier not to obey the command. The Master needs you and is calling for you. I believe this devoutly. I pray that you will do the same. It was all very well for Reuben to abide among the sheepfolds in time of peace, but abiding was cowardly skulking when the trumpet sounded the charge to battle. And Sisera's onslaught was child's play compared with the hordes menacing the Zion of our time. The biggest city in the world was never more emphatically Satan's stronghold than it is now, and the fight grows more furious daily. You and men like you are needed at the front and to man the fortifications.

"One word as to the retiring officer whose place the Captain of Salvation orders you to fill. The church has behaved most handsomely throughout the whole unpleasant transaction. They have accepted regretfully the resignation his declining strength and advancing age compelled him to offer, they added to printed resolutions conveying their affectionate esteem and that I had not heard from him for an age! What's up now, I wonder?"

The signature at the bottom of the third page of the closely written sheet was "Calvin Barrows." The top of the first page bore the printed letterhead of a city church, and beneath the address of the pastor—"Rev. Calvin Barrows, D.D."

There was pleasurable anticipation, but no misgiving in the reader's face as he began the perusal gratitude for his long and faithful services in the church the premium upon his life insurance presented upon the twentieth anniversary of his pastorate. You need have no compassionate scruples in that quarter. Providence has made the way so clear for you that I am exultantly hopeful of having you as a fellow-citizen and companion-laborer in the Lord's Vineyard before long.

"If I have seemed officious in urging upon you the advantages to the church of our love and prayers and the career offered to yourself in the unexpected opening of this great and wide door, set it down to my sincere regard for your father's son and my lifelong friend, and to the intensity of my desire to see you doing valiantly in the forefront of what I agree with wiser seers than I in believing to be the 'Battle of Armageddon.'

"With affectionate regards to Mrs. Haile, believe me to be now and ever,
"Faithfully and fraternally yours,
"CALVIN BARROWS."

DR. BARROWS had written as he would have talked to his fellow-clergyman. As he read, Haile could have fancied that the well-known accents—harsh to grating in excited periods—sounded in his ears. He reversed the letter and read it from top to bottom of each page, for the second and then the third time. Then he folded it up and pushed it into the table-drawer, turning the key in the lock. Next, he strode to the door and locked it on the inside; pulled the linen window-shades down over the windows, front and back, and sat down in his arm-chair, his elbows upon his knees, the forehead clenched between his folded hands.

That the problem of his life had been suddenly thrust upon him he knew as well as if a voice from heaven had thus assured him. Not for one instant did he temporize with the truth that the revelation was unwelcome and, as he re-read it, harrowing. He loved his work above his chief joy. He believed as in his existence that the Master had called him to it as truly as when He bade the Galilean fisherman brothers: "Follow me, and I will make you fishers of men."

The labor of love grew upon his heart and soul and mind until it entwined itself about his very being, and, God help him! how he had grown to love his "people"! Could there be an echo of the Master's voice in the impending "call" to leave them—now and forever?

"Dear Lord!" broke sobbingly from him, by and

The First Instalment

SILAS FORD, the dominant figure in the fashionable Banner Church in New York City, is profoundly impressed while on a visit to the home of Robert Lawson in Marlinton, a few miles distant, by the preaching of Rev. Stuart Haile, whose ten-year pastorate there has been extraordinarily happy and successful. The leaders of the Banner Church have determined on the resignation of their pastor, Rev. Dr. Samuel Stetson, because they believe that at the age of sixty-three he is too old for the best interests of a modern city church conducted with strict regard for business-like efficiency, and a committee goes to Marlinton to hear and see the minister whom Mr. Ford had proclaimed to be a "find." Rev. Mr. Haile is unaware of their inspection and is looking forward with pleasure to many more years of service in the field which he, his devoted wife and their two children have found so congenial.

by. "It would be tearing the tree I believed was of Thy planting up by the roots. And I have sat under its shadow with such delight! Can it be that there was sinful selfishness in the love I bear my—children? Have I led them astray when I thought I was guiding them nearer and nearer to Thee?"

He put out a hand presently and pushed the vase of flowers further away. All the year round he found flowers upon the study-table when he came in at nine o'clock for the morning's work. The scent now brought a reminiscence flood. For years afterward the odor of wallflowers revived the heart-ache. The faces of the donors, who so constantly remembered how he loved flowers, swam before him in a bewildering haze. Old men and maidens, matrons, boys and girls—sometimes a toddling baby brought in the mother's arms to bring the pastor a "posy" and remind him that he had baptized the child.

BAPTISMS, marriages—perhaps, most of all, burials—had knit more closely the bonds that held the "people" to their spiritual father. He had told his wife that he intended they should call him that when he grew old and gray-headed. He liked the lovely custom of the "High Church" Episcopalians of thus accosting their clergyman. He had thought in saying it, that he would, as a matter of course, spend the rest of his life here. The Psalmist had the same thought in the confident prediction that goodness and mercy would follow him forever. Because he would dwell in the house of the Lord forever, close beside the green pastures and within hearing of the ripples of the waters of quietness.

He groaned again. Only last Sunday he had explained to his Bible class of ten young men and fifteen young girls that "waters of quietness" was a better translation of the text than "still waters." How eagerly the dear children always listened to such bits of information gathered during his Seminary course, but seldom gleaned except in such classes as his by the average Bible reader!

It was nearly one o'clock when he mounted the steps of his temporary "home." That was a needle-thrust, too. Doors were open all over the house, to allow the bland air free circulation upstairs and down. From the upper hall floated his wife's song. She had a passion for old ballads. This one had been a favorite with her mother in her girlhood. When the daughter did not recollect the exact words she improvised one or two that went with the tune. That she never lost. At another time the husband would have been amused and rallied her upon the interpolated line or two. Now he shuddered in laying aside his hat and cane.

"Happy hearts! Happy hearts
With mine have laughed in glee;
But, oh, the friends I loved in youth
Are dearer unto me.
Then give me but my thatch-roofed eot:
I ask no palace dome.
For I aye dwell content with those Who make my humble home."

"She has got thatch on the brain!" muttered Stuart with a wry smile. He made up his mind that he would not speak to the singer of the impending blow until the "call" actually arrived.

CHAPTER V

"AS I have told you, I have a trick of recollecting rhymes, texts, or proverbs, as soon as my eyes are open in the morning. Sometimes they are utter nonsense—like Mother Goose's melodies; at others, indifferent in quality. These I forget as quickly as possible, throwing them into the mental waste-basket. Others are helpful all day long, even inspiring. This morning there came full-fledged into my head a line I heard you quote before we were married, in an address to a college fraternity with a Greek name. They were new to me, then, but I scribbled them on the

From a Second-Hand Store

There Are Many Very Real Things That Are Not Quite New

what happened to her? And how did you come by her jewelry? Did she die in great poverty? Or did she lose her most valued possessions? Or were they stolen? How did you get them?"

The old man sighs again, way down in his chest, when I ask my questions. And then, hastily, he reaches for a different trinket and begins to weave a different story about it. And, at the critical time, he breaks off again and leaves me burning with curiosity and wondering—incidentally—whether he has a secret to keep or an extremely vivid imagination. I'm inclined to believe it's imagination—but every once in a while I think that there's a strain of real fact back of the make-believe. All of his stories—every one of his incidents—might have happened!

YES, the proprietor of the shop may, at times, draw upon a secret fund of romance to explain the odd—and sometimes very beautiful—objects that he has for sale. But whether his stories are true or not, one thing is certain. And that is his keen appreciation of the loveliness of his wares, the real joy that he takes in handling his treasures! He is quite different from the men who work amid the glittering wealth of modern jewelry stores—his stock is not treated casually, and as a matter of dollars and cents. The second-hand finery that he disposes of seems to hold a very real personality for him. And a decided, extremely poignant, charm.

"I'd rather work among second-hand things," he told me once, "than with the costliest jewels on the market. I don't envy folks that own big places—they don't get the pleasure that I do out of their work! Second-hand things have character! There are stories back of 'em. Sometimes you can almost know what the folks was like that they belonged to. Sometimes it's like talking with those folks, just to hold the things they was fond of!"

"There's lots of people in the world who don't take no stock in things that ain't new. I've seen folks turn up their nose at my shop, so I have! 'Don't you carry any new goods?' they'll ask. And, 'We don't want a lot of old junk!' they'll tell me. But they can't hurt my feelings. For I know that they're just the sort of folks that don't—that can't—understand!"

"New things are good—don't misunderstand me. But second-hand things aren't worthless just because they've been used. Sometimes they're better—more seasoned, sort of—on account of the using!"

SECOND-HAND things—yes, they're often as good, and many times they're far better, than new things. Just because they're second-hand they shouldn't be discarded. Just because they're second-hand they shouldn't be laid upon the shelf!

Mothers, for instance, and fathers, and grandparents. They don't belong to the younger generation, perhaps, but they have the joys of the younger generation at heart. They can understand and appreciate the happiness and the misery of youth all the more keenly because they have gone past youth. It always hurts to see them pushed aside—it's real physical pain to see them being ignored and left out. Remember that!

There was a time when fine old mahogany was piled away in the wood-shed, and imitation oak furniture was given the place of honor in the parlor—because it was new! But after the newness had worn off the oak, furniture folk would see that it wasn't worth much—and that the old mahogany in the wood-shed was still good and beautiful. All it needed was a little polishing—a wee bit of attention to bring out its loveliness. And yet—after all—it was second-hand!

Jewelry that has been worn is just as graceful—just as much of a decoration, as new jewelry. And often it has more distinction. . . . Old, lustrous furniture will outlast all your modern morris chairs and mission wood—don't, if you have any, part with a stick of it!

And the older people—bless them—the parents and the grandparents have the wearing qualities of the mahogany furniture and the fine second-hand jewelry. Don't because they're older, put them in the background! Every year that brings age also brings an added value!

THERE'S an old shop that I visit often, when I'm in a mood to be pleased or entertained or interested.

It's a dingy old shop on a dingy old street—one that has stood for many years, and without change, on the same spot. The glass in the broad window of it is blurred, more by age than by the dust that clings so rigidly—the counters and show-cases are worn with the print of the hands, with the utter weariness of the elbows that have pressed down upon them. It even seems that the doorsill has responded, tiredly, to the sound of the feet that have crossed it.

The shop is a second-hand shop—it makes no pretence to anything better. All of the goods displayed in it are second-hand—all of its fixtures are second-hand. Even the old proprietor—a white-bearded man who wears a shiny black skull-cap—seems second-hand. And his one clerk—a shade younger, perhaps, but none the less ancient in appearance—seems second-hand, too!

It is mostly jewelry they sell in this shop, jewelry and quite a bit of old silver plate. The jewelry dates back, often, a good many generations—often it recalls the time of the Civil War. It makes one see, in a vision, the hooped skirts of the early sixties; it makes one think of violin music and the sweetness of honey-suckle, sometimes.

WHEN the old proprietor is in a friendly mood—and he usually is in a friendly mood—he can make an hour or two pass very charmingly. He has a way of delving into old cupboards, of pulling out dusty drawers full of the dull glitter of gold and the subdued shine of unpolished silver. He has a way of bringing out quaint rings and brooches, he has a way of telling a story about this locket, or that bracelet!

"This," he'll say, "was give to a young woman by her lover, long ago. She was a great belle, she was—almost a reigning beauty, you might say. Her lover give her this for a birthday gift and they say as she treasured it more than any of her other pretties. She wore it when she went to Lincoln's first reception in the White House. An', later, to her own weddin'. She'd have wore it to her grave, poor lady—" And then he has a way of sighing, and breaking off, very abruptly.

"But," I will remonstrate at a time like this, "but

Is the Church Decadent?

ONE of the easiest things in the world is to discredit an institution because it is not filling the ideal that its teachers or leaders set up.

The Church has for an ideal a perfect type of Christian disciple. But the actual ideal of discipleship is rarely reached.

The Church has a ministry that ideally should be characterized by the highest qualities of eloquence, administration, tact, refinement, courage, equanimity, and spiritual exaltation. But men of the highest type with all these qualities are exceedingly rare.

The Church has a program that is the greatest of all institutions, the saving of human life and the redemption of the world; but it does not measure up to the standard of its own program, owing to human limitations and weakness.

The Church has been charged with hypocrisy, aristocracy, lack of sympathy with the working masses, with narrowness of dogma, and with futility in forming public opinion, with the failure of exerting any influence to stop the war or to create any positive reconstruction policy after it.

Yes, it is easy to charge the Church with weakness and failure as an organization, and point out its faults and say it is losing ground, and that some other agency must be created to take its place. But while that organization is being formed by the critics, it will not be out of order to notice a few facts about the Church which seems to have a way of going on, in spite of the critics. This year, as the Saturday Evening Post recently said, the churches of America gave $3,000,000 to the starving Chinese. The Presbyterians increased their membership last year 150,000, making a total of 1,700,000 members. The United Brethren gained over 50,000 last year. The Methodist Church, South, asked for $33,000,000 for its forward work, and received $52,000,000 in subscriptions. It is now planning a campaign to obtain $33,000,000 for religious education. The United Presbyterians report last year's growth the largest in the history of the church. The Methodist Church, North, last year had more accessions to its membership than at any time in its history, and has dispensed almost entirely with professional evangelists, using its own ministry as the Presbyterians also have done, that church employing for a part of a year 1,700 of its own regular ministers.

With all the talk about a decadent church it is always a fact that if there is a "drive" for charity or for any human need the churches in the town always are appealed to and always respond. It is a question to raise and, if possible, to answer: How much money would have been collected during the war for the Red Cross or the starving in Europe and China and around the world, if all churches and church members in the United States had refused to give a dollar?

The "decadent church" as some critics would have us believe is at least showing some lively signs of being awake. It is not a perfect church. There are no perfect human organizations. There is no perfect business, no perfect or ideal politics, no perfect educational system, and let us say it kindly, no perfect critics. In short, there are no "super-men" in charge of the Church, either as ministers or members. But using the human material it has, and even in the midst of the failure to realize its ideals either for itself, or to satisfy the critics, the church of Jesus Christ in the world does go on, and it does do things of incalculable value for the making of a better world. The Church is not decadent. Neither is it the ideal that it should be. It is not fair to expect super-men to be present in the Church all the time to do the impossible. There are no such men. Only in Christ can the ministry and the members expect to do all things. And even Paul said he had not yet "attained."

The Unemployed

WHILE other nations bear the heaviest burden of famine conditions and wide-spread suffering—the legacy of the World War—our own land has not wholly escaped. Unemployment continues to press our working people severely in many states. In the big cities there are more bread-winners idle than we have ever known. Over 5,000,000 work-

First Endorsements Are Received

THE Baptist Temple, of which Dr. Russell H. Conwell is pastor, with a membership of 2,000, has forwarded signed resolutions to the Christian Herald endorsing the objects of the international disarmament conference. St. James' Lutheran Church of New York City, of which Dr. Julius Remensnyder is pastor, also has returned the resolutions, signed, as has the Bethany Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia. These are the first responses to the suggestion of the Disarmament Endorsement Committee contained in last week's Christian Herald, and it is sincerely hoped they will be followed at once by thousands of other churches.

If you have not done so already, present these resolutions to your pastor and church board urging that action be taken immediately to place your church on record on the question of world peace and disarmament. Send the signed resolutions to the Christian Herald. Before the date for the conference the sentiment of the Christian people of the country will be made evident to the governments by the presentation of the resolutions at Washington properly authenticated. The text follows:

Whereas: President Harding has called a Conference on Disarmament to be composed of the Principal Allied and Associated Powers and China, to be held in Washington, D. C., on November 11th, 1921;

Whereas: the Christian people of the United States of America of all denominations are by their profession of belief in the teaching and Spirit of Jesus Christ committed to the policy of World Peace and to Disarmament as a means to the accomplishment of that goal; Therefore

Be It Resolved: That we, the pastor, officers and members of ——— Church, do hereby express our hearty approval of the action of President Harding and pledge to him our support in every effort to bring about World Peace.

ers are jobless, waiting and watching hopefully for the return tide of industrial activity. It is a dark situation with an ominous background.

A writer in the Brooklyn Standard-Union tells of the result of the recent investigation of unemployment conditions in the metropolis. It began with a visit to the Bowery Mission which, as the writer says, is recognized to be a "barometer of industrial conditions." There it was learned that, owing to increasing unemployment, the "bread line" had been revived automatically, and indications point to the problem for food and shelter assuming record proportions in the event of a severe winter and continued idleness.

Among the readers of the Christian Herald there are thousands of earnest men and women who have been deeply interested in the work of the Bowery Mission in the past. The old Mission is now preparing to face what seems likely to prove the hardest winter in its history. Ever since its foundation in 1879 it has fought to win men—old and young alike—from lives of idleness and crime, and to bring them under influences which would aid in transforming their lives. The Brotherhood of the Mission, organized fourteen years ago, is steadily growing from year to year, and now numbers over 35,000 enrolled members. This great body of redeemed men includes workers in almost every branch of industry, and not a few in the profession. No one looking in at a meeting of the Brotherhood, seeing the intelligent faces and hearing the instructive and helpful discussion, could ever imagine that any of these Christian business men were ever "down-and-out." Social castaways! Yet such is the fact, and there is no lack of similar transformations among the physical and moral derelicts in all of our big cities. The spiritual and social salvation of this class has been the task of the Bowery Mission ever since its beginning—a task that has gone on increasingly through all the years. Straightening crooked lives, planting the seeds of Christianity and good citizenship, and developing the capacity for self-support, constitute a work which, under God's blessing, becomes a benefit to the whole nation.

When you think of the coming winter and the condition of the poor, the homeless, the workless, don't forget to reach out a helping hand to the Bowery Mission.

Prayer for Disarmament

THE whole civilized world will watch the proceedings of the coming Conference of the nations called to consider the question of disarmament, with the greatest interest. No meeting, not even the one at Versailles after the armistice, has greater significance or the possibility of more far-reaching influence. The value of the gathering will depend on the motives and purpose of the men representing the nations around the table. If self-seeking and diplomacy and intrigue rule the conference it will be of no use to the people who are sick of war and hate and suspicion. If openness of mind, and good will prevail and an honest longing on the part of the nations to really disarm, then the Conference will mark one of the great advance steps of the human race towards happiness, and prosperity.

In the face of all that the Conference may mean to the world, what would be more fitting than a day of prayer called for all the people, irrespective of sects and denominational differences, to ask that the counsels of the Almighty may prevail at the Conference table? We would welcome a united call to prayer from the Worlds Evangelical Alliance, The Federal Council of Churches, The Great Prayer Commission, the Christian Herald's Prayer League, and all church bodies in all parts of the world, in a united petition that God's presence might be felt by all who have any part in the deliberation of the Conference. President Harding, Secretary of State, Hughes and Premier Lloyd George are church members and professing disciples. May we not take for granted that these men will pray themselves for divine wisdom? How much may the powerful united prayer of a united body of believers avail to shape the counsels of the men at this momentous gathering!

A call to Prayer! A united call! A prayer union that will make history! A nation praying for the nations! A prayer for universal peace and brotherhood!

Let the call go out!
Join with the Christian Herald in bringing it before every church in this land!

An Editor's Testimony

THAT there are editors who are not wholly engrossed in the discussion of sensational crime, politics and business, but who find opportunity to give more than a passing thought to great religious problems of our times, is evident from the thoughtful and spiritually helpful articles we occasionally find in the daily press.

A Christian Herald reader in Evanston, Illinois, sent us a copy of the News-Index which is published in that city daily, Sunday excepted, and which presents a practical illustration of journalism with a religious side. Its leading editorial on "Christian Progress in our Times" is a lucid presentation of facts which every reader should feel grateful to find so clearly and convincingly stated. The editor shows how Anti-Christianity, so rampant in Ingersoll's day, has almost died out and been well-nigh forgotten, while the religion of Jesus Christ continues to make steady progress throughout the whole world. "Jesus is becoming a larger factor in the life of the times," he writes and he calls attention to the remarkable fact—an example in book-making records—that in the past fifteen years, no fewer than 125 new books on the life of Jesus have been written and published.

Then he states his own impressions in these words: "So tender, penetrating, strong and helpful was that life, that it reaches hearts as does no other. As the years multiply since His passing from sight, the better He is known. More people are loving Him and obeying His word than in all the previous years. And it has come to pass, in our time, that He has the Name that is over every other name."

Such is the testimony of the busy editor of a daily newspaper, and we believe the overwhelming majority of his readers will honor him for it. What a power the press might become if other editors were equally outspoken!

As the ZR-2, wrecked over Hull, England, appeared far aloft. She was the largest dirigible ever constructed and had a cruising capacity of 9,000 miles at normal speed of fifty miles an hour. Her length of 695 feet was fifteen feet shorter than that of the L-71, the largest of the Zeppelins, but in every other way she was larger, having a disposal lift of fifty tons and a capacity of 2,700,000 cubic feet of gas.

Peace Treaties with Germany and Austria Are Signed

THE United States at last is technically at peace with Germany and Austria through the signing of treaties which were negotiated with such secrecy that even the members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee were in the dark as to what was being done. It was not until the day on which the Austrian treaty was signed and the day preceding the signing of the German treaty that President Harding summoned the Republican members of that Committee to the White House to take them into his confidence regarding the terms and character of the treaty. This was followed by a meeting of the entire Committee at the Capitol to hear a statement by Secretary Hughes relative to the negotiations.

The text of the German treaty was made public at the State Department after word had been received that it had been signed by Ellis Loring Dresel, the American Commissioner in Berlin, and Dr. Friedrich Rosen, the German Foreign Minister. The compact assures to the United States all the rights accruing to this country under the Treaty of Versailles, but provides specifically that the United States shall not be bound by the clauses of the Versailles treaty relating to the Covenant of the League of Nations, nor by any action by the League, Assembly or Council, unless it shall expressly give its assent to such action.

The text of the peace resolution, adopted by Congress and approved by President Harding on July 2, 1921, is embodied in the document, and Germany expressly assents to all of its conditions; while other articles of the treaty specify by number the articles of the Versailles pact covering American rights and those under which the United States assumes no obligations. Among the sections from which the United States disassociates itself are those relating to the boundaries of Germany; to the political clauses for Europe; to certain provisions with respect to China, Siam, Liberia, Morocco, Egypt, Turkey, Bulgaria and Shantung; and to the international organization of labor under the League. The United States reserves the right to participate in the Reparations Commission and in any other commission established under the Versailles Treaty, but is not bound to participate in any such commission unless it elects to do so.

Both treaties would have been signed on the same day, though not by design, had not the raising of an unexpected technical point which Mr. Dresel wished to refer to Washington caused a day's delay on the German treaty. The Berlin formalities were carried out quickly and without ceremony, and so little heed was paid to precedents that the American representatives appeared in business suits, probably the first time a treaty has been signed in such garb.

The Austrian negotiations were conducted by Arthur Hugh Frazier, the American Commissioner in Vienna, and the ceremony of signing also was lacking in formality. The event came as a welcome surprise to the people of Austria, but the terms of the treaty were not revealed at once, as the government wished to avoid public discussion until the Foreign Affairs Committee of the Parliament had approved the document. The text of the Austrian treaty was not made public in Washington, but it was assumed it followed the general lines of the German pact.

A treaty with Hungary was being negotiated.

Congress Begins Thirty-Day Recess

WITH final passage of the Campbell-Willis anti-beer bill blocked by a Senate filibuster, both Houses of Congress have dropped their work for a recess of thirty days. The House had adopted the conference report on the bill by a vote of 169 to 81. The Senate fight over the measure was so bitter that for a time it appeared the recess plans must be abandoned, but the dry leaders gave up their efforts to push the bill through after the House had voted for a recess at the time fixed by the Senate several days ago and after foes of the measure had made it apparent that they were prepared to talk indefinitely rather than allow it to come to a vote. Senator Reed conducted a bitter and prolonged attack on the conference report on the ground that it failed to protect the constitutional guarantees against unreasonable searches and seizures, and other leading opponents were Senators Lodge, Brandegee and Watson of Georgia.

The recess does not kill the bills on which no action was taken, as would have been the case with an adjournment, but so many other important measures are to be considered when Congress reassembles that it was doubted the anti-beer bill would be passed unless it was amended to meet the demands of its foes. In the meantime the Internal Revenue Bureau was expected to issue the regulations for the use of beer and wines as medicines, which had been held up for many weeks in anticipation of prompt passage of the anti-beer bill.

Forty-Four Perish in ZR-2 Wreck

THE dirigible ZR-2, the largest airship ever constructed, was flying over Hull, England, after a final trial flight of thirty-five hours, preliminary to her transfer to the United States Navy Department, when she suddenly was seen to break in two and fall in flames into the River Humber. Sixteen American and twenty-eight British officers and enlisted men perished in the wreck, only one of the Americans and four of the British on board surviving the disaster, the worst in the history of aviation.

The Navy Department was to have paid $2,000,000 for the ZR-2, formerly known as the R-38, and another million had been spent for wages, transportation, trials and other expenses preparatory to her flight across the Atlantic to the $3,000,000 hangar which has been constructed at Lakehurst, N. J. The start of the transatlantic flight had been set for the day following the disaster, but a postponement had been made necessary by the discovery of weaknesses in the framework of the craft. It was explained, however, that the framework had been strengthened with only a slight decrease in lifting capacity and that the dirigible was entirely airworthy.

Lieutenant A. H. Wann, the British officer who was navigating the airship at the time of the disaster, and one of the few survivors, attributed the wreck to the breaking of several of the girders amidships, made of an aluminum alloy. He heard the grinding and cracking of girders, followed by a pitching of the craft forward, nose down, and then by terrific explosions—all coming within a few seconds. There was general agreement that no explosions occurred until the airship had broken.

Among the Americans lost was Commander Louis H. Maxfield, who was to have had charge of the ZR-2 on the transatlantic flight. The most distinguished of the British victims was Brigadier-General F. M. Maitland, Air Marshal, one of the Empire's foremost aviation experts, and one of those who crossed the Atlantic aboard the R-34.

Panama Yields Disputed Territory

SECRETARY HUGHES' insistence on peaceful compliance with the White-Loubet award has resulted in Panama's yielding to Costa Rica the disputed territory of Coto, near the Pacific, over which the two republics engaged in a miniature war some months ago. With Costa Rica pressing for possession of the area, matters were drifting toward a renewal of hostilities if the United States stood aloof, when the despatch to Panama of a battalion of Marines coincident with the sending of a note by Secretary Hughes informing Panama in effect that the time had come for carrying out the award in Costa Rica's favor brought a change in attitude.

Panama had at first threatened to resist a Costa Rican advance, but a new note by Secretary Hughes declared the United States could not permit a resumption of hostilities, and she then yielded and issued orders for the evacuation of the Coto area, contenting herself with vigorous protests against the American policy and with a declaration that she reserved the right to act when opportunity offers.

The western end of the boundary thus settled, a commission is to mark the line near the Atlantic. On this commission Panama and Costa Rica have one member each, while two members have just been appointed by Chief Justice Taft. The doubtful territory there is wild and almost uninhabited, and has been held by Costa Rica.

Irish Reply to British Offer

EAMONN DE VALERA, the president of the Irish Republican Parliament, has replied to Premier Lloyd George's letter refusing to compromise on secession or to consider external arbitration by sending a communication which in effect rejected the peace proposals of the British government but carefully left the way open for further negotiations. One significant and hopeful feature of the reply was that it avoided reference to a republic, although it enunciated the principle of independence, and another

Duty, the Prime Question

A Sermon by REV. ERNEST BOURNER ALLEN, D.D.*

TEXT—Eccles. 12:13. "Fear God, and keep His commandments; for this is the whole duty of man." Acts 5:29. "We must obey God rather than men."

DUTY is a good word for youth and for our times. It has held many a man to a hard task and stemmed the current of lawlessness and ease. This is the judgment of honored leaders of our day. Dr. Francis E. Clark says: "The longer I live, the more I feel like emphasizing the word and the more important I believe it to be for this particular day and generation." Dr. Cadman, writing on Matthew Arnold, says of Puritanism: "Its discipline has been invaluable; and the more I read history, the more I see of mankind, the more I recognize its value." The Puritan had an overmastering sense of his duty. Dr. Jefferson says: "To follow the line of least resistance is easy to us all. . . . It leads to flabbiness of mental fibre and brings about a fatty degeneration of conscience. On every hand is heard lamentation that the sense of personal responsibility is so feeble. Men and women otherwise highly respectable show an amazing insensibility to obligation. With them the idea of duty is slowly dying. One of the first words to be put on the lips of the child is 'duty.'"

The conception of duty is to be found early in the consciousness of Jesus. There are evidences of an awakened soul when He was a lad of twelve. He carried the thought of responsibility with Him through life. At one time He says: "I have a baptism to be baptised with and how I am straitened until it be accomplished." At another time He declares: "I do always the things which are pleasing unto Him." He did not hesitate to say to Himself: "I MUST."

In the great battle of Trafalgar the English fleet defeated the combined fleets of Spain and France and dashed Napoleon's imperialistic hopes in spite of his brilliant victories at Ulm and Austerlitz. "The big ditch," as he contemptuously called the English Channel, became the last obstacle which separated the autocratic, militaristic monarchy from democracy. That fact made it possible for France to become the source of the American Republic and to perpetuate the principles of freedom and faith which had been won by the Anglo-Saxon peoples. Admiral Nelson, who died just as the great battle closed, uttered these memorable words, "Thank God, I have done my duty!" It was the same spirit which Paul had when he said with honorable pride: "I have fought a good fight, I have finished the course, I have kept the faith." There was another message which Nelson flung from the admiral's ship before the battle: "England expects every man to do his duty." History records how well they did it!

GOD does not expect men to do less than their duty! The fireman at any moment must answer the call of the clanging bell; the policeman must resist crime in the act or the corruption which seeks to conceal it; the motorman must stand with his hand on lever and bell; the cashier must hold with fidelity the securities of thousands; the father must uphold the honor of his home; the mother must attend to her myriad cares; the teacher must look after forty or fifty giggling irrepressibles; the preacher must face his problems and the President his perplexities; the business man must work out his complex problems; ALL—God expects every one of them to do his duty!

The Christian interpretation of duty is not to be neglected. What do we mean by the word? Some of us have had the humbling experience of using a word for years and then awakening to the fact that we cannot define it. Such a word is duty. We say, "You ought to do this or that." Men often declare: "If a man does his duty that is all that can be expected of him." Very well, what is duty? It is something due, something we owe. Why? To what? To whom?

Some say that duty means keeping the law, which may be found in customs, in our environing conditions or in our ideals. Duty in this conception is hard and inexorable. It lacks warmth and a certain appeal. Duty also consists in pleasing a person. It enables one to live in the sense of serving an approving and watching person. The Psalmist gave expression to it when he said: "Oh, how love I Thy law." He did not say the law, but Thy law." Paul faces his duty without flinching because he can say: "I count all things but loss that I may please Him." It was in the heart of that man who said to his pastor during the wife's serious illness: "I shall go to the dogs if that little woman dies!" Wouldn't the moral law be left to control and help him? Oh, yes! But not the same power which was expressed in her personality!

True, then, it is that "If Christianity has put motive and enthusiasm and driving power into human goodness it is just because it has the thought of duty as the pleasing of persons." And when we consider the manner in which John Stuart Mill was brought up, with every idea of God excluded from his consciousness, it is the more significant that he should write in after years: "After all there is no better practical rule of life than so to live that Jesus Christ can approve your conduct."

CHRISTIANITY interprets obedience to duty as the key which opens the door to truth. That is a most profound utterance of Ruskin's which says: "Every duty we omit obscures some truth we should have known." That is the reason Jesus said: "He that doeth the will, shall know of the doctrine." Neglect of duty not only weakens our lives, but blinds them to the great truths which God has for us to understand. Instead of delaying and saying, "If I understood things better, I should be glad to do more," men must dare to do the things which God requires. Then they will discover that He has revealed the meaning and extent of truth to them while they were trying to obey Him.

There is great inspiration in a study of lives to duty

please him who enrolled him as a soldier." Like Jesus Christ he said: "I have a baptism to be baptised with and how am I straitened until it be accomplished." He accepted the axiom of Roswell D. Hitchcock to the graduating class: "At whatever cost, accept the service offered you, high or low, far or near. Then burn to the socket!"

Thank God for such men in the world today. More and more we feel that Phillips Brooks was right when he said: "This truth comes to us more and more the longer we live, that on what field or in what uniform or with what aims we do our duty matters very little, or even what our duty is, great or small, splendid or obscure. Only to find our duty certainly, and somewhere, or somehow, to do it faithfully, makes us good, strong, happy and useful men, and tunes our lives into some feeble echo of the life of God." There are a few men left like Jonah, the man who failed to understand. He is a type of any man who has a duty to perform, seeks to avoid it and tries to go the easier way. He would rather be called to Tarshish than Nineveh. One looked easy, the other hard. Many duties are indeed pleasurable, but we must not put pleasure at the front of all our plans.

A distinguished Christian leader tells of a conversation with a friend who reported the story of a downtown church in a great city, maintained by the money and personal service of a group of laymen. He said it was a serious problem whether young men and young women were growing up in our churches who had been trained to carry loads! "It is appalling," he said, "the number of young people trained in Christian homes and reared in Christian churches who have no sense of responsibility which does not bring them personal pleasure." For that reason we need our Christian Endeavor Societies with their pledge and challenge. We need churches with their covenants and war cries. The church which does not require anything of its members is worth little. A man might as well join a club. Only last week I had a notice from a business man's organization to which I belong, stating that if I missed four meetings in succession, without excuse, I would be automatically dropped from membership! Such a rule in our churches would take out fifty per cent. of the members this year. What effect would it have upon your membership?

THE prime question for every Christian to face is this: In what spirit do I meet my duty? One thinks what might happen on the football field when the team is lined up for signals. The captain shouts them out and turns to pass the ball when some lad rushes up to him and says: "Oh, captain I'm tired! I'm all out of breath! I've been running hard! Remember how I carried the ball last year! Let somebody else do it this time. He can do it lots better than I can. Let somebody else kick off!" Right in the midst of the game when the goal is within striking distance, thousands of church members want to retire and let somebody else play the game! They make good rooters and that is about all.

Phillips Brooks used to go to other lands and study their religion, their customs and their life. One day he returned to Boston from India and a group of his parishioners had gathered at the dock to welcome him home. They stood around while his trunks were being examined by the customs house officer. One of the group said, "Well, Bishop Brooks, I suppose you have brought home a lot of new religions you have to pay duty on!" And the bishop looked up at him very soberly and said, "No, I would never make that mistake. I would never bring home to the American people any religions with duties attached!" What would he say today?

THE total ministerial support of the Methodist Episcopal Church for 1920 was $24,988,323, according to a survey made public by Dr. C. M. Barton of the Division of Appropriations of the Committee on Conservation and Advance. Of this amount, pastors' salaries, including house rent, were $21,944,613; the District Superintendents' salaries, $1,369,221; Bishops' salaries $314,080; and for Conference Claimants or for Preachers' Pensions $1,360,109. For building and improvements, the Church spent $10,655,179; and on all indebtedness, $4,626,796; and for all current expenses, $11,210,835; a total of $51,481,133. Centenary and other apportioned benevolences for the church were $16,089,675; Woman's missionary societies and Children's Day Funds, $3,073,672; a total of $19,163,344. Dr. Barton finds that this gives a total disbursement for the Methodist Episcopal Church for the above purposes in 1920, of $70,644,480.

Our Sunday Service at Home

The Christian Herald Sermon is now read in many Homes as a Sunday Evening Service, a simple form of conducting which is outlined below. Neighbors should be cordially invited

Our Saviour and our Friend,
And with Thy presence we shall be Protected to the end. AMEN.

wed. Consider the story of Ruth, which the French atheists and philosophers to whom Benjamin Franklin read it called the most beautiful pastoral in all literature. Her choice of worlds was not Moab but Bethlehem. Her loving heart felt the need in Naomi's life and constituted a duty which she did not desire to evade. Take that young woman who graduated some years ago from Smith College and asked where her life was most needed. She was trying to choose her world, so she went down to the East Side of New York into the tenement district to serve and save.

"The sweetest lives are those to duty wed,
Whose deeds both great and small,
Are close-knit strands of an unbroken thread,
Where love ennobles all.
The world may sound no trumpets, ring no bells,
The Book of Life the shining record tells."

IT WAS so in the life of William Booth. At sixteen, the son of a Nottingham builder, he finds his life motive in a mission conducted by an American evangelist. He becomes the general of an organization with 15,000 subaltern officers. He gets his preachers from the slums. He dies poor. He builds no million-dollar temples where the elite marvel and murmur and pray. He spends his life in the spirit of the cablegram he sent around the world as a key-note for the Army: "OTHERS." He hired no special trains in spectacular fashion to take him from one city to another. His uniform was "no robe around a megaphone!" He felt it the "duty of the disciple to make the Gospel unavoidable." His was the Pauline life and spirit. He felt that "no soldier on service entangleth himself with the affairs of this life; that he may

The Level of Possibility

SUNDAY. Phil. 4 : 13. "I can do all things in Christ who strengtheneth me." It is always a crucial question, how to free a man's personal equipment, and release it for the warfare of life. It is the question of all questions in education—how to liberate a man's powers, and develop them to the full measure of their appointed capacity. But the need becomes specially urgent when we enter the highest realm, and deal with the moral and spiritual faculties of the soul. How to awaken these supreme gifts, and bring them into triumphant exercise!

In one of Stevenson's letters, in which he describes some days that have been slightly touched with morbidness and depression, he says: "But I must get out my wings!" He suggests that he had been forgetting his wings, and had therefore toiled along in irritation, when he might have been borne along in joy. He had trudged along a heavy road when he might have been cleaving the air! And there are untold numbers of people who are just like Stevenson—only they don't get out their wings. They remain as depressed and wearied pedestrians, when in reality they are purposed to be the birds of God, countering the difficult circumstances with splendid power of wing. "With twain they did fly!" Yes, we are purposed to use the bird-equipment, but we don't get out our wings, and so we are overborne and overdone.

And thus it is that we live our lives, and we come far short of the level of our destined possibilities. We live mean lives which do not wear the distinction of splendid daily triumphs. We are small beings, using only a part of our personality. We are pigmies, although we are created on the scale of giants. There is nothing that is towering and impressive in our judgments. There is nothing that is large and buoyant in our feelings. We are not magnanimous in thought or life. We are lean and undersized. We are weaklings, mastered by circumstance. We are not stalwart athletes, taking five-barred gates at a leap.

Well, how is the bigger part of our being to be awakened and brought into use in our daily life? How are we to get out our wings? How are we to dominate our circumstances as an airman dominates all the changing features of a countryside? Here is the secret—"I can do all things in Christ who strengtheneth me." We find ourselves in finding Christ. Our powers are unfolded as we pass into His communion, just as a flower is unpacked by the liberating ministry of the sunshine. Watch a rosebud disclose its imprisoned glories at the touch and fellowship of the light! And so it is with the wonderful powers which are housed in the soul. They troop out at the call of Him Who is the Lord of life and the Light of the world. Union with Christ vitalizes our entire being. We drink His blood, and our weakness becomes strength. His blood both purifies and builds up our anemic nature. We add a cubit unto our stature. We become strong in the Lord and in the power of His might.

And as Christ creates and awakes, so He nourishes and sustains. We are daily endowed with a competency which is stronger than any circumstance. We meet all our tasks in Christ, and one by one the tasks are fulfilled. And so our level of possibility is lifted to the height of the daily demand. Nay, it is lifted beyond and above it; for we are more than conquerors in Him that loved us. He is the great magician: in Christ all is made alive. J. H. J.

Looking to the Life Beyond

MONDAY. Gen. 42 : 36. "Joseph is not and Simon is not, and ye will take Benjamin away; all these things are against me." Jacob thought two of his sons were dead, but they were living and Joseph was preparing to save his father's family from perishing by famine. A friend once visiting the White House said to President Lincoln: "Your son Willie is alive." "Oh, don't mock me," replied the stricken President. The friend continued, "But Christ said so Himself—I go to prepare a place for you; I will receive you to Myself." Immediately Mr. Lincoln threw his arms around Rev. Dr. Vinton's neck and sobbed aloud on his breast, saying, "Alive! Alive!" The clergyman said, "Seek not your son among the dead; he is not there, he lives in Paradise. Our God is not of the dead, but of the living."

If we look upward by faith, we will behold beckoning hands and faces calling us to join them. As Joseph was alive in Egypt, preparing for the comfort of Jacob and his family, so Jesus is in glory preparing for our homecoming. When He calls, we surely will go to Him. Believest thou this? Then live in anticipation of reunion with the redeemed in the undiscovered country from whose bourn no traveler returns.

O that men might know Him Whom to know is life eternal! Who inspires in the soul the consciousness of life forever. We see through the telescope of faith a great cloud of witnesses in the gallery of the skies cheering on the multitudes in the race for the goal. To die is to live a thousand-fold larger life in the dwelling-place of God's wide universe. E. W. C.

The Law of the Harvest

TUESDAY. Matt. 7 : 16. "Ye shall know them by their fruits. Do men gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles?" The law of the harvest, like all other laws of the universe, is fixed, immutable, eternal. "As a man sows, so shall he also reap." He who plants thorns reaps thorns; who plants grapes reaps grapes. William Hohenzollern, planting the seeds of oppression and materialism, has given the world a harvest of devastation and desolation. Jesus of Nazareth, planting the seeds of God's love in the heart of a disciple band, has given the world the promise of a harvest of universal good-will and peace among men.

The world is divided into two camps. Mighty armies on both sides contend for a harvest. Some are sowing good seed, some bad seed. Some are rendering unto God, some unto Cæsar. The Spirit of Christ with His doctrine of ministry is in combat with the spirit of Napoleon with his doctrine of remembering only self. The philosophy of Jesus with the altruistic aim of creating the God-man helping his brother is at sword's point against the philosophy of Nietzsche, with the selfish aim of creating the superman, claiming superiority over his fellowmen. It is the universal dualism inherent in every individual, the good in everyone striving for the mastery over the bad in everyone. It is God in every man and woman at grips with the devil in every man and woman. It is the wheat against the tares, heaven against hell, the Son of Man against the son of perdition. The final harvest will be according as humanity sows.

Who sows the best seed? The missionary with his Bible or the libertine with his bottle? Which is the prouder of his harvest? The saint or the sinner? The kind or the unkind? The unselfish or the selfish? Who are the real benefactors of the race? The Christian teachers or the pagan preachers? The workers in our churches or the workers in the realm of vice? Those who concentrate time and talents on the things that are lovely, pure, good and true, or those who concentrate on the things destructive and sinful?

Let the honest student and consistent investigator open the book of history and give answer. "He that goeth forth and weepeth, bearing precious seed, shall doubtless come again with rejoicing, bearing his sheaves with him." R. B.

Religion and Experience

WEDNESDAY. John 20 : 31. "That believing ye might have life through His name." "Belief" is one of the key-words of the New Testament. It is not so common in the Old Testament. "Trust" is the Old Testament word. A third word is common to both. That third word is "faith." These three words have a large common meaning, though each of them has a separate and distinctive meaning.

One disadvantage in the use of the word "faith" is its very commonness, its familiarity. We have two other words closely related to it—"belief" and "trust." Belief is of the intellect. Trust is of the heart. Faith is of the will. All three of these words reveal how intimately religion is related to life. The weakness of some people's religion is that it is thought of as apart from life. Jesus addressed Himself to the task of relating religion to life. How practical is the Sermon on the Mount! It is not a complete theological system, and it was not designed to be. The Master probably had in mind two classes of people whose fundamental religious errors He designed to correct. They were the intellectualists and the formalists. So He simplified religion, objectified it, practicalized it, personalized it, socialized it.

Look at the Beatitudes. See how many of them have to do with social relationships. In correcting the errors of the formalists, Jesus vitalized religion. There are two phrases which are much used, "the love of life" and "the joy of life." Has Jesus anything to say about these? Much, in every way. He points to the joy of spiritual health and moral victory. He leads us to the joy of entering largely into the life of the world. So he puts soul into life.

It is sometimes said religion is too unworldly. The Christian religion is unworldly, but it is also worldly in the best sense. It teaches us to make the most of life, and by so doing to make the most of the other life which God has in store for His children. C. C. A.

Life's Great Value

THURSDAY. Mark 8 : 36. "For what doth it profit a man to gain the whole world, and forfeit his life?" There is but one answer to the question, "Nothing!" To gain the whole world full of material things, and in the gaining to forfeit life, is not profit; it is loss. The robber who points a gun in your face and requires of you "Your money or your life!" knows full well what your answer will be if you take him seriously. Between things and life there are no values worthy of comparison.

Yet the Master implies that men are doing that very thing—that they are gaining the poorer things of life and thereby forfeiting the higher, that they are wealthy in goods, but not "rich toward God." The sad part is that we awaken too late to the havoc we have wrought. We have failed to find the real values in life. That encasement of the spirit, that body which is like unto the animal, we have saved, while the spirit, which is like unto the Eternal God, we have forfeited.

In one of his works, Coningsby Dawson has given to us the pathetic picture of the promulgation of a court-martial sentence: "The man was an officer; he had been sentenced to be shot, but the order had been changed to cashiering. There, in the sunlight, all his brother officers were drawn up at attention. The sentence and the crime for which he had been sentenced were read aloud to him in an unsteady voice. When that was ended, an officer stepped forward and stripped the buttons and badges of rank from his uniform. It was like a funeral at which his honor was buried. I see him standing there in the strong sunlight white-faced and dumb—better dead—despised. Here was one who had failed. The arithmetic of his spiritual values was at fault: he had chosen bitter life, when death would have been splendid." We are not often brought face to face with death, but we are forced constantly to choose values. Is the "arithmetic of our spiritual values" ever at fault?

Our choice of values is the determining factor in life; and it is the determining factor in eternity. All other things are dependent upon our estimate of the things supremely worth while, the things of such importance that we are willing to subordinate all things else to their attainment. What are you finding to be "Life's Great Value"? Are you trying to gain the whole world and forfeiting your life? J. A. M.

The Helpful Life

FRIDAY. Isa. 41 : 6. "They helped every one his neighbor and every one said to his brother, be of good courage." The prophet has given us a picture of the ideal life—the program of the Christian life. The only ideal that is worth while is the ideal with a tendency toward realization. The fact that every one helped his neighbor, and every one said to his brother, "Be of good courage," has been proven practicable and worthy of our study.

It was proven beyond controversy by the attitude of Jesus in His day and it is being proven beyond dispute by the lives of genuine Christians in these days. It is the logic of the social settlement and the missionary field. Slowly but surely the doctrine of the Golden Rule, the ideal of reciprocity, the great idea of co-operation, is finding its way into industry, private life and among individuals, public and private.

There is one branch of the Christian ministry into which all may enter and render effective service. The one thing heedful in many a life for mutual helpfulness and elevation to a higher plane and a fuller hope is that large encouragement and broader sympathy which each is able to give to the other.

One way to express ourselves to the world is by telling it how it fails. The Christian way is to tell it how it may do better. Reproof never goes so far as praise, and condemnation never yet won its point half so quickly as commendation. Tell a person how well he is doing, even if he gets no farther than the effort, and he will endeavor to "live up" to the kindness shown. The kingdom of business, of education, of any realm always comes by kindness, and all kingdoms are or should be part of the Kingdom of God, the very foundation of which is kindness, and love in action, manifested unto and by the least and the greatest. R. B.

Works Must Follow Faith

SATURDAY. James 2 : 22. "By works is faith made perfect." Can a man be justified by faith without works? "Faith without works is dead," and obviously a dead faith is no faith at all. Works are the touchstone of faith: they are the very evidence of it.

The man who has really believed in Jesus can assure himself of the genuineness of his faith only by the fidelity with which he does his Master's will.

The real question, therefore, is not one of Works versus Faith, but of Faith plus Works. The logic of the apostle James is clear: "A man may say, Thou hath faith and I have works. Show me thy faith without thy works, and I will show thee my faith by my works." D. J. B.

A Model Home for Lepers

IT IS difficult to estimate, even roughly, the number of lepers in China, although Sir Patrick Manson, the greatest authority on tropical medicine, asserts that probably more are to be found here than in any other country in the world. Leprosy is most prevalent in the south.

The attitude of the Chinese in general toward lepers is that of mild tolerance or indifference, although by some they are regarded as wicked and immoral, and hence hated and shunned. A few years ago, during the reign of the Manchus, I was shocked to read in a Shanghai newspaper that forty-two lepers, men and women, had been driven into a pit and burned to death somewhere in the south. When the local official who ordered the holocaust was called to account by the Peking government, he excused the atrocious deed by calmly declaring that he considered he was rendering a service to his country by ridding it of these cumberers of the ground.

In certain districts, villages for housing the lepers have been built at public expense. Each leper is given a small monthly stipend which the able-bodied are allowed to supplement by going daily to the neighboring cities to beg. They mix freely with the crowds, there being no attempt at segregation.

It was the missionaries who first reached out a helping, brotherly hand to the despised Chinese lepers. With the aid of native assistants, they do periodic work at the leper villages, conducting religious services and dispensing salves and other simple palliatives. There are a few homes for lepers under Missionary Boards. One, at Pakhoi, on the extreme southern coast, opened many years ago by the Church Missionary Society, has accommodations for a hundred men and fifty women, who occupy buildings in separate compounds. A well-conducted school for the younger ones is held each morning, while in the afternoon all who are able engage in industrial work, which is carried on and financed by the lepers themselves. The majority of the inmates are Christians.

In Hanchow, the capital of Chekiang province, Central China, the

What One Chinese Refuge Is Doing to Brighten Their Lives

By MARY NINDE GAMEWELL

Church Missionary Society has another leper home on the summit of a hill in the suburbs. Air, outlook and environment are all that could be desired. The thirty-five or forty lepers who find an asylum in this refuge are made as happy and comfortable as possible.

The story of the founding of the home at Siaokan, fifty miles northwest of Hankow, is most interesting. Twenty-five years ago, Rev. Griffith John of the London Missionary Society, while out on an evangelistic trip, sought lodging one night in the home of a strange Chinese family. He was kindly received and entertained, but what was his horror the next morning to find that his host was a leper and that he had slept in a leper's bed! At that time leprosy was thought to be infectious as well as contagious. The incident deeply affected Dr. John, and he took it as a call from God to do something in behalf of the lepers, so he opened a small refuge at Siaokan. Twenty years ago, the general hospital work of the London Missionary Society at this place was taken over by Dr. Henry Fowler and with it the leper home, which has been in his care ever since. This leper home became the model institution of the kind in China.

A few months ago I stood at the compound gate and looked with admiration at the green sward, the flowering plants, and the cluster of long, low buildings. The one hundred and twenty leper men wear a uniform of dark blue cotton cloth trimmed with a narrow border of red. They looked so neat, and were so quiet and orderly, that I found myself right in among them before I realized who and what manner of men they were.

The buildings of this Model Home are immaculate. The carefully screened dormitories, with their cot beds covered with blue-and-white counterpanes, and the walls tinted a restful pale buff and green, are a joy to behold. So are the kitchens, laundries, dispensary, and even the sheds in which the fuel is kept. All the work in the establishment, except the cooking, is done by lepers.

SOME of the men sat in groups in shady corners on the verandas, playing a simple form of chess, which is a favorite game with them. Each patient is given monthly a little pin-money with which he may buy and cook little dainties in a small kitchen set apart. The men forfeit the privileges of using the kitchen if they leave any dirt behind them. Close to the Home stands the leper chapel where Sunday and other services are held. The dining-room is the meeting place for morning and evening prayers. Three-fourths of the men are Christians.

"I wish you could be here for one of our Communion services," remarked Dr. Fowler. "The Chinese are not an emotional people, yet many a time I have seen a Chinese pastor, called in to officiate, moved to tears as he watched these poor lepers partake of the Lord's Supper."

For several years there has been a Y. M. C. A. in the Home, and quite recently a Christian Endeavor Society was organized with about forty members. The men are very proud of their Christian Endeavor pins. Not long ago the Christians contributed over twenty dollars to home missionary work in distant parts of China—money was raised by the utmost self-sacrifice.

Dr. Fowler, who has made a special study of leprosy, said to me, "After twenty years here, I am no nearer discovering a cure than when I first landed. Yet none of us are relaxing our efforts, but are constantly experimenting with new serums. Although I cannot cure, I am able to relieve pain, and that is something."

Dr. Fowler believes that under proper government regulations, leprosy could easily be stamped out in China in two generations.

was that it expressed a reluctance to resume the old state of warfare.

Mr. de Valera's letter opened by announcing that the Dail Eireann by unanimous vote had rejected the British proposals. It then attacked the principles on which those proposals were based, declaring that: "In Ireland's case to speak of her seceding from a partnership she has not accepted or from an allegiance which she has not undertaken to render is fundamentally false, just as the claim to subordinate her independence to British strategy is fundamentally unjust. To neither can we, as representatives of the nation, lend countenance." If the British government is willing to accept this basis, it offered to appoint representatives with plenary powers to arrange a settlement.

Premier Lloyd George answered at once with a firm reiteration of his previous stand and a declaration that he and his colleagues had gone to the very limit of their powers in endeavoring to reconcile British and Irish interests. He expressed regret that the Irish reply marked no advance, and warned that a mere exchange of notes could not be prolonged indefinitely, stressing the necessity for some immediate and definite progress toward a basis for negotiations.

The parleys were thus at a deadlock, with the next move in doubt.

CHURCH ROOMS TO SERVE AS POLLS. The Boston Board of Election Commissioners has announced that the Sunday-school rooms of forty or more churches are to take the place of the old-fashioned voting places at the December city elections because of the advent of equal suffrage, a more agreeable atmosphere being desired for women voters.

BISHOP W. S. LEWIS DIES. Bishop Wilson S. Lewis, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, died in a hospital at Sioux City, Iowa, of diabetes, after a long illness. Since 1908 Bishop Lewis, who was sixty-four years old, had been stationed at Shanghai, China. He was intimately familiar with the work of the Christian Herald in China and one of the group who made possible the success of the Christian Herald Fukien Industrial Homes. His last illness became apparent while he was in Japan several months ago en route to the United States.

MATTHIAS ERZBERGER ASSASSINATED. Matthias Erzberger, former leader of the German Center party, an advocate of the fulfillment of the nation's reparation pledges and a strong supporter of the Wirth government, was assassinated while on a vacation in the Black Forest. He had planned to reenter politics actively, and his murder was attributed to political enemies, attempts on his life having been made earlier by reactionaries.

GREEKS DEFEATED IN ASIA MINOR. Greek forces which had crossed the Sakaria River in a drive against Angora have suffered a severe defeat at the hands of the Turkish Nationalists and their right wing has been placed in a position of extreme danger, separated from the main body. The Salt Desert has proved a formidable obstacle to the Greek advance and was largely responsible for the defeat.

tenary of the opening of the gardens to the public. They were established in 1817. The Saharanpur gardens are given credit in connection with the Botanical Gardens of Calcutta for originating the tea culture of the Himalayas and Assam and for contributing to the museums of Europe the finest assortment of tropical plants of any other existing gardens.

ONE of the recent industries taken up by Mr. Borup for the benefit of the school and the public alike, is the

with a youthful bridegroom sitting in the center. He had a veil over his face made up of silken cords such as we have seen horses wear to keep off the flies in summertime in America. At a time when he ought to have been in an industrial or other school preparing to earn a living and make a useful citizen, he was marrying a still more ignorant and immature girl. The bridegroom and his companion had two hookahs from which they were smoking and I plainly smelled the presence of intoxicating liquors as well.

repair of automobiles, which are rapidly multiplying in India. He obtained an old automobile which he took apart in order to teach the mechanism. He already has two patrons, owners of fine automobiles, who will look to him for repairs when needed, and others will doubtless patronize the school when they learn of its efficiency in repair work.

My impressions of the value of the industrial school were greatly deepened by a walk through some of the streets of Saharanpur. In one mohalla I photographed some boys, the younger ones entirely naked and the older boys nearly so, standing beside a than, a kind of an earth mound used in idol worship. The boys of course had no money but what is more tragic they had no incentive for study or useful industry. A half-hour later we came across a group scenes as these the industrial school seemed like a veritable paradise. Happy the boys who have found the path which leads to it. But here we must pause for a note of regret.

The school formerly had 150 boys in it, now it has only 60. The reason is simply an economic one and not any lessening of the popularity or efficiency of the teachers or the school. It is simply another industry crippled by the high cost of living without a corresponding increase in funds from the home churches. A few years ago the 150 boys cost the mission the same price the 60 cost now. While the government helps some the missionary appropriation has been cut instead of increased. Nevertheless with all of its limitations the Industrial School at Saharanpur is a monument of usefulness and success.

lectures, social hours, citizens' mass meetings and mothers' meetings in the church proper, lacking a more fitting place. But many church houses, church basements, and parish halls are still waiting to be utilized.

The way to start social activities is to start them! Examination of large numbers of programs seems to indicate that organization falls into four broad and general heads: Social Recreation; Indoor and Outdoor Play; Constructive Citizenship Activities; and Biblical Dramatics and Pageantry. No elaborate preliminaries are necessary for inaugurating any of them. The most important thing is the selection of committees, the first committees necessary being those to provide for such initial equipment as is decided upon. A mass meeting should be called early to which representatives of all church groups, such as the Sunday-school classes, the Ladies' Aid Society, the Woman's Missionary Society, the Altar Guild, the Girls' Friendly, and the Mens' Bible Study Class, should be especially invited. This will insure the interest and co-operation of every group all along the line.

There follows a bibliography of books which contain much interesting and helpful information on the general subject of the everyday mission of the church. It is printed here so that the reader may continue his own search for the best way in which his church can more adequately meet the opportunity and responsibility, unique to its particular setting in its own community.

back of an envelope then and there, lest I should forget them. I have kept fast hold of them ever since. You recollect Oliver Wendell Holmes's "The Nautilus?" You quoted but one verse:

"Build thee more stately mansions, O my soul!
As the swift seasons roll!
Leave thy low-vaulted Past.
Let each new temple, nobler than the last,
Shut thee from heaven with a dome more vast
Till thou at length art free,
Leaving thine outgrown shell by Life's unresting sea."

"And you added—'Every growing soul must sometimes have to writhe itself, as with birth-pangs, out of the shell in which it was once comfortable.'"

Stuart Haile held that "morning moods" were unkind, selfish, ill-bred and unchristian. But on this particular day, the lively little wife had to do most of the talking. The children had asked to be excused and left their emptied plates and mugs. Stuart sat, silent, stirring his second cup of coffee as diligently as if he hoped to read meaning in the circles of tiny bubbles cast to the surface by the dissolving sugar. As she recited his comment upon the lines he had quoted, he looked up with a startled gaze.

"Did I say that? I do not recall it." She had brought him out of the mists of abstraction. Her laugh was pleased and loving.

"Say it? Of course you did! And let me remark that I thought then, and now I know, that it was as fine as anything in the poem itself. I could not have imagined it. I am neither poet nor philosopher and there are both poetry and wisdom in that little sentence. What is it, dear?"

For her husband continued to look at her with deepening and darkening eyes.

"Only that you 'have builded better than you knew.' Some day I may thank you for it. Just now, I have so much on my mind that I cannot speak of what held my eyes waking far into the small hours."

He drank his coffee at a gulp and set back his chair.

"No, my love!" in answer to her alarmed face. "You have done and said nothing amiss. We will talk it all over when the time comes. Your good angel was at your ear this morning. Thank you once more, and good morning! I have a full day ahead of me."

WITHIN twenty-four hours she had the whole story. The Call came by the afternoon mail. An early train brought Silas Ford on an important business visit to Marlinton—business that kept him in close confabulation with his friend, Mr. Lawson, behind the closed doors of the latter's private office. From him the amazed parishioner heard for the first time that the Marlinton church was in imminent danger of losing its beloved leader, and that Mr. Ford's errand to the town was prompted by impatience to learn authoritatively and officially if the Banner Church might push to a satisfactory conclusion certain movements meditated by the managers.

"I don't mind giving you a hint, Lawson, that we are planning a unique demonstration that will make the public sit up and open its eyes," he dropped his voice to say. "I am not at liberty to go into particulars at present. But I can give you a hint as to one feature of the affair. If, as we devoutly hope and pray your preacher will see the advantage to the Cause that his acceptance of our call will be—I am not talking now of the gain to himself in the reputation he is bound to make in the city—my idea (and I believe it to be original) is to have a mammoth meeting of the congregation and all the distinguished ministers we can get, at which the old pastor will be bowed out (so to speak) and the new bowed in. Can you imagine anything more taking? Such an exhibition of good feeling on both sides and of the attachment to the retiring pastor on the part of the people he has served for a quarter of a century! We are going to give another proof of this which will also be new and striking and must be a boom to church work everywhere. That feature is to be kept dark until the evening of the double reception. Then there will be a beautiful and I may say appropriate surprise to the outsiders and to the senior of the two ministers. Our women have caught on to the idea with enthusiasm and—believe it or not as you will!—are bound to hold their tongues up to the right minute.

"I telephoned to Mr. Haile—we'll have him a D.D. before long—as soon as I got to the hotel to ask when I could call on him at the church-study. Somehow, I felt it would be more business-like to have our talk there than in the Parsonage. I am instructed to sound him good and hard as to his intentions. If he is the level-headed, practical, common-sense fellow I've been led to think him—there's no doubt what answer I'll take back to town tonight. No, thank you, my dear fellow! I can't stay overnight. I say! come and dine with me at half-past six at the Marlinton Inn! I can tell you all you want to know by then. I am to be at the study at eleven sharp. Now that I have started upon this enterprise, I won't let the grass grow under my feet. That isn't the way with Ford and Talbot when once they are on the war-path."

"I am by no means sure that you will tell me all I want to know," responded the other, smiling ruefully. "It wouldn't be natural that our views upon the subject in hand should be identically the same. But, I hardly dare go home to tell my wife and family of what is in the air before I hear the report of your interview. City churches and their pastors hold different notions from ours with regard to changes in the relations. You see, Mr. Haile has grown into our very lives, as you might say, in the ten years he has been with us. As you have said yourself, he has a sort of magnetism about him that impresses even strangers. Rich and poor feel that he is their friend—almost their brother."

To Ford's surprise and embarrassment the mill-owner got up abruptly and walked to a distant window, drawing his handkerchief from his pocket as he walked. It was a full minute before he rejoined the visitor, and his voice was not quite natural then.

"I can't trust myself to say all I am thinking just now," putting his hand into that Ford held out apologetically. "Never mind it, old man! I am hoping things may turn out all right yet. A pulpit like yours won't go begging, if our shepherd sees best to stay with his sheep. Yes! I'll be with you at half-past six."

HIS spirits were not raised by the report of the momentous interview. Neither were they dashed to earth. Mr. Haile had been dignifiedly noncommittal. The matter was too important to be settled without longer and more serious meditation than he had had time to bestow upon it. The church should hear from him definitely within three days.

"He said that time and skill were required to tear up a tree by the roots without damaging its future usefulness," concluded the emissary. "It is easy to see that he dare not refuse at once to take a more responsible position in the church militant, and that he must acknowledge that men of his calibre are sadly needed in high places. But you people—he called you 'my people' half a dozen times!—have worked your way into his affections as truly as he has won you all to himself. I don't blame him for being disinclined to leave you, and if he were my pastor, I'd move all of heaven and earth that I could get at before I'd let him go."

"When all is said and done, the decision lies with him—and with the Master he serves," answered Lawson in a low voice.

Ford was hampered by no such scruples. His intonations did not vary a semi-tone:

"Right you are! We all acknowledge that. But some general principles prevail in all trades—and professions!

The case before us is as plain as print to my way of thinking. Marlinton is a nice snug, little town, that may double its population in thirty years or so. It may be called fairly prosperous at present. The probability is our minister could stay on here for the rest of his natural existence, keeping up the church at a respectable average and raising his family in comfort, even managing to educate his children well and, if he has a prudent manager in his wife, laying aside a little every year against the time when he will have to step down and out to make way for a younger man.

"Such pastorates were rather common a hundred or so years ago. They are obsolete now. A preacher must make hay while the sun shines. Twilight comes earlier to him than to other professions. Mr. Haile's harvest-time is in the next dozen years. After that the market value depreciates with him. He has brought his church up to the top-most notch. He may hold it there for a few years longer.

"Why, my dear friend, the case is so clear that I don't see how a sensible man, who has the best interests of the Church at heart, can hesitate. We don't expect him to be willing to go right out of hand. He isn't the sort of timber we counted upon if he doesn't feel that the separation from the people he has served so faithfully and long is a terrible wrench. I have enough faith in him and in the One Who I verily believe has ordered every step of this affair to hope that he will see his way clear to come to us. I was never so conscious before that I was 'led' along the whole way.

"I am not superstitious, but I shall always think there was something out of the ordinary run of human affairs in my being induced to stay here over that Sunday, and as to the two sermons that day and the experience of that evening—I can't speak of them even now without a sort of awe. My old mother was a firm believer in what she called 'special leadings.' If she was right, I had one that has stuck by me all through this business."

HE HAD dilated upon this conviction in the conference in the pastor's study that noon. The crude eloquence which the obsession lent to his speech was not without its effect upon his superior in intellect and education. Stuart Haile could not rid himself of the impression left by the two hours' talk. Was there not a substratum of truth in the argument of Dr. Barrows thus enforced by the story of the "leading"? If this were true, had he a right to hearken to the pleadings of personal inclination and personal loves?

The question haunted him persistently all the day long, strive though he might to rid his imagination of it.

It was a turbulent day. From the moment when, through the gossip of inn-loungers, Silas Ford's errand was whispered abroad and corroborated by the postman who had committed to memory the stamped inscription upon the official document from the Banner Church, Marlinton buzzed with what was direful news to nine out of ten of those who spread it. The parsonage was besieged all the afternoon and evening by visitors of all ranks and ages. When the front door closed upon the last, an hour before midnight, husband and wife faced one another with eyes that spoke the same language.

"You are tired to death, darling!" said Mrs. Haile, drawing her fellow-sufferer into the library with tender solicitude. "Don't try to say a word! I know all about it. Lie down upon the lounge and let me make a cup of coffee for you."

It might keep him awake for the rest of the night, as she reflected in suggesting it. What matter? He would not sleep as it was. His haggard visage frightened her. She would hardly have known it had she seen it elsewhere. As she left the room for the kitchen, she extinguished all the lights save one which she shaded from the wretched eyes she could not bear to look into.

When, as a young girl of twenty, Anita Sherwood had promised to marry Stuart Haile, she had volunteered a pledge which she had kept religiously: "I shall never interfere by word or look with what you think is your duty in your profession. 'Whither thou goest, I will go. Where thou lodgest, I will lodge. Thy people are already my people and thy God is my God.' We have no readjustment of duties to arrange. I shall never say a word to try to influence you in any important step you think it right to take. It would be rank and wicked presumption."

She had kept her word. She would not break it now, mused the worn and weary man while she was absent upon the little errand. But, oh, for a word of affectionate counsel! a flash of light upon the dark road along which he was stumbling!

When he had drunk the coffee he spoke of the longing:

"Precious wife! be my conscience in this as you have been in other trials! What ought I to do?"

SHE knelt beside him and gathered his head into her arms.

"My own beloved! I would give my heart's blood to help you. Ask me for anything else, and it shall be yours. But you know why I can say nothing now. It would be like taking hold of the Ark of the Lord to steady it. The question is between Him and your own soul. The poor fool who tried to steady the Ark had forgotten to Whom it belonged. I must keep that in mind if I never have done it before. Don't tempt me!"

He raised his face to meet her lips.

"I know! You are stronger than I. I will not ask again."

He closed his eyes for several minutes, then met hers appealingly.

"If only some of them did not take it for granted that I must go because it is a larger and more important church, and"—wincing as he brought it out—"that the salary is twice as large. That hurt me, for I hoped they knew me better by now."

"They are judging you after the manner of men. I have heard the same talk again and again when other ministers were called to more important churches. Don't think of that now. Our Father knows it all. And in His own good time He will lead you into the right way."

"Dear wife!" came again presently as he shielded his eyes from hers. "Is it very wicked and rebellious in me that I do not want to go? Don't despise me, love! but even if I could be assured that it is my duty, I feel that it would break my heart to leave all we have here. Home and the loving friends we have made and kept so long. And the host of blessed memories gathered while we have sat in heavenly places in Christ Jesus!"

He hid his face upon her arm and groaned in bitterness of spirit.

A minute elapsed before the reply came. It was low and fraught with meaning:

"Have you then made up your mind to go?"

"I wish I could say 'No!' I am like one hanging between heaven and earth. You, of all living creatures, know that it would be like a death-pang to accept that call. Yet—how much truth was there in Dr. Barrow's letter? And Mr. Ford harped upon the same string until I thought I should go mad. Dearest and wisest of advisers! Tell me what to do."

Her voice was steady and rang like a bell.

"You know why I cannot, and why I should not if I could. Every soul must 'write' out of the outgrown shell by itself and for itself. Otherwise—this I have read—it is mangled and dwarfed by the helping hand. I repeat that I dare not lift a finger to the task. Stuart, my love! Our Father is leading us in ways we have not known. We must cling as for life itself to the thought that they are 'His own' who are thus led. And that He never fails to grant us strength for the 'day that now is.' Have you forgotten that He 'nowhere promises grace for fagots'? This has been a hard day—a crucial day! We will say one little prayer now for the sleep that He gives His beloved, and believe that it will give us strength for what the morrow may bring to do or to bear.

"We have a right to do this"—with a murmur of merriment that felt to him like the spray of cooling waters—"for tomorrow is already today. It is a crumb of daily bread for which we ask."

The Mistakes That ruined millions of teeth

We offer you here a ten-day test which will change your ideas about teeth cleaning.

The old methods failed to end film. So millions have found that well-brushed teeth discolored and decayed. Now dental science has corrected those mistakes, and we urge you to see the result.

Film—the great enemy

That viscous film you feel on teeth is their great destroyer. It clings to teeth, gets between the teeth and stays. It dims the teeth, then may foster attacks on them. When you leave it, night and day it may do ceaseless damage.

Film absorbs stains, making the teeth look dingy. It is the basis of tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea. Also of many diseases.

A daily combatant

Dental science has now found two effective film combatants. Able authorities have amply proved them. Leading dentists everywhere endorse them.

Both are combined in a dentifrice called Pepsodent. Millions of people have come to employ it. And glistening teeth, half the world over, now show its delightful effects.

Results quick and amazing

This ten-day test will surprise you. It will give you a new idea of what clean teeth mean. The benefits to you and yours may be life-long in extent.

Each use will also multiply the salivary flow. That is Nature's great tooth-protecting agent. It will multiply the starch digestant in the saliva, to digest starch deposits that cling. It will multiply the alkalinity of the saliva, to neutralize the acids which cause tooth decay.

So five effects, now considered essential, come from every application. And the early result is clean, beautiful teeth.

Send the coupon for a 10-Day Tube. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the viscous film. See how teeth whiten as the film-coats disappear.

This test will be a revelation to you. Cut out the coupon so you won't forget.

Abstinence for the Sake of Others

International Sunday-School Lesson for September 18
I Cor. 10:23-33; 3:16, 17

By REV. SAMUEL D. PRICE, D.D.

THERE are a number of 3:16 verses which are most helpful. Some of these are in John, Malachi, II Timothy and in our lesson today, I Corinthians 3:16, "Know ye not that ye are a temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you?" It will be both interesting and profitable to search for other precious 3:16 verses and then fix them in your memory. This would make good home work and then compare the findings on Sunday.

The verse in Corinthians can be accepted as one of the reasons for observing temperance in all things. The place must be clean where God dwells. Just ordinarily clean is not enough for the surgeon when he is about to perform an operation. He must be so clean that there are no bacteria which will, by any possibility, go from him to you and endanger your life. Jeremiah 2:22 tells how we cannot be made clean in heart: "For though thou wash thee with lye, and take thee much soap, yet thine iniquity is marked before me, saith the Lord Jehovah." The only way of becoming pure in heart is by the blood of Jesus Christ, and when we are cleansed by Him our bodies are fit places for the indwelling of the Holy Spirit, and then He will be in us, the hope of glory.

When Paul was at Ephesus, on his third missionary journey, he wrote this first letter to the church at Corinth, which had been founded on his second general journey. Write "I Cor." in the margin of your Bible opposite Acts 19:10 and at the end of I Corinthians, write, "From Ephesus, see Acts 19:10." Nelson's Cross Reference Bible was mentioned in an earlier study. Turn to it now, or to some book that gives similar information, and read the introduction to this epistle. There is a clear chapter on this epistle in "Paul's Letters," by Rev. D. J. Burrell, D.D. Do similar research work as you come to each epistle, or as you read any other book in the Bible. Study to know the author and his purpose. A student in music follows this plan before endeavoring to interpret a really worth-while composition.

SUCH a study of I Corinthians and a careful reading of the lesson for the day has given you a background of information which enables you to observe the very helpful way in which Paul advises the new converts in that idolatrous and licentious city of Corinth. The flesh of animals which had been slain as a sacrifice in idol worship was good for food—in fact, very good, since a blemished animal would not be used for heathen worship. This would be the meat generally sold and Paul's word is to eat it without the slightest question, unless another objected to its use on conscientious grounds. In such a case refrain from eating. Hurting the feelings of another was of greater moment than refraining from eating meat on that particular occasion. Anything can be given up when the objective to be gained is great enough. Paul's supreme concern was to save souls. He would not permit any roast or stew to loom larger in his estimate of values than a life saved eternally in heaven.

The old question of rights and personal liberty comes up once more in connection with this study. There is no denial of these things. Generally when one insists on personal liberty, he is only seeking license to go to some extreme. George Macdonald has well said, "The best thing about our rights is that they are our own and we can give them up." It is like being generous with time, talents or money—"The Lord loveth a cheerful giver." How helpful is Paul's trio of daily rules: "Give no occasion of stumbling; please all men in all things, that they may be saved; do all to the glory of God." These rules will work well in this twentieth century. Such actions enable a person to have a good conscience when it comes time to sleep or to appear before the judgment seat of God.

The quarterly temperance lesson was adopted by the International Sunday School Convention with the primary object of destroying the legalized liquor traffic. What faith Frances E. Willard, B. F. Jacobs and others had, and how gloriously has it been blessed! Like Paul, when approaching Rome, we will today thank God and take courage. The battle is still on and it is particularly against those who are traitors to the Flag in their open lawlessness. The day this lesson study is written the papers tell of the seizure just outside the three-mile limit of a vessel which had $144,000 in whisky on board. These are surely days for the insistence on practical loyalty, even as when this nation was recently in open war.

SCIENCE, economics and experience are all against alcohol. It is very interesting to observe how men in high positions are merely reasserting the statements concerning alcohol found in the school text books of today. President Heinisch of Austria, at a reception in Salzburg to a committee of a German temperance league, said, on July 25, "We would have won the war if the people in both Germany and Austria-Hungary could have been persuaded to practise total alcoholic abstinence." This is the kind of information that the average pupil in our public school knows. There are numerous sets of stereopticon slides which tell the story of temperance in a forceful way. These slides can be rented and they are fine for use on Temperance Sunday, October 30, or on any day when the quarterly temperance lesson is studied. Superintendents and teachers should prepare for this occasion which comes four times a year. They can have variety and effectiveness, but it does mean work.

Recently in an open trolley car four Boy Scouts in uniforms were on the front seat and two boys on the next seat. One of these boys on the second seat, a lad about twelve years old, was smoking a cigaret and it attracted considerable attention. When the conductor came along he told the boy he had no business to smoke at his age, and further he was too green not to know that smoking was allowed only on the three rear seats. That cigaret was thrown away with evident shame. Two ladies sitting on the third seat, had the following conversation: "Does a Boy Scout smoke?" "No, he must not." "But what if he does?" "At the first offence he is reprimanded, at the second he is suspended, and the third time he is dismissed from the organization."

Such an organization deserves the active help of the officers of every Sunday school. There are Scout troops in many of our Sunday schools, both in America and on the foreign mission field; there should be more. It is a matter of note that the Sunday-school superintendent or teacher who smokes has little if anything to say to the school or class on the subject of the cigaret, and a smoker is a very poor man for a Scout Master.

Smokers seem to have too little regard for the rights of others. The records of disastrous fires started by a lighted "smoke" are abundant. For example, the miner had been forbidden to smoke when in the mine, but he lighted up where there was an excess of gas, and 400 were killed by the explosion. It was just another case of a man insisting on using his "personal liberty."

A lesson must have a personal application, and there is no better person to begin with than yourself. Let each of us diagnose our acts according to the following question: What am I doing, needlessly or intentionally, which causes annoyance or actual harm to others? Now ponder again that trio of rules laid down by Paul, and make worthy decisions for immediate action.

Sins of the Tongue

C. E. and B. Y. P. U. James 3:1-5

THE author of our reference tells the people of his day not to envy the teachers, because they have a difficult task. Their business is to talk and talking right is a hard job. It is a question of early guidance and the practice of caution. "A fool speaks first and thinks afterwards but a wise man thinks before he speaks." A diplomat is a man who can keep silence in seven languages, but the greatest asset to civilization is the individual who can speak the truth in every language.

In thinking this theme through let us remember that there is a difference between talk and conversation. Ruth McEnery Stuart makes the mother of Rose Ann, speaking of her daughter's gifts and defects, say, "Rose Ann always could talk a-plenty, but she never could converse." Conversation at its best is a fine art. Emerson said, "There are three classes of people—those who discuss ideas, those who discuss things and those who discuss other people—and the last is the lowest." Doctor Hillis said: "Man is still the talking animal and as of old the issues of life and death are in the tongue. For the lips are fissures in the rock through which gush hidden waters—sometimes sweet, sometimes bitter. Oft the tongue is a goodly branch, laden with luscious fruit; oft also, it is a club that falls with crushing force. Now the tongue is a shield lifted up for sharp attack against the wrong; now it is a spear whose sharp point is turned against the right. The sword has slain its thousands but the tongue its ten thousands."

Jesus, greatest speech-maker that ever lived, said, "By thy tongue thou shalt be justified, and by thy words thou shalt be condemned." "Sirs," said Samuel Johnson, noted for his conversational powers, "it becomes a gentleman to entertain his company with the finest thoughts on the finest themes." And Cowper said: "Sacred interpreter of human thought, How few respect or use thee as they ought."

But all shall give account of every wrong Who dare dishonor or defile the tongue."

And Shakespeare joins the chorus

The Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

REQUESTS for prayers for success in revival efforts and for spiritual awakening continue to predominate in the letters to the Prayer League. Reader, So. Dak., writes: "I again ask the prayers of the League for the conversion of a doctor, that something worth while may be given him to do, in place of the worldly pleasures he is trying to give up. Also pray that a religious awakening may take place among the people of Armour."

"Please pray that our annual revival meeting at the National Camp Meeting ground near Greenbuck, Tenn., may be one of the greatest spiritual uplifts the community has ever known," writes E. L. B. "Pray that the right worker may be sent, and that he may speak the things that will help our neighbors and relatives to know and seek Jesus Christ as a pardoning Saviour."

S. C. H. writes: "Pray for the Reformed Church at Mapletown, N. Y., that they may have a revival of religion and that many may be saved and the church greatly strengthened."

Mrs. W. C., Garnett, Kans., asks prayers in behalf of the church at Hyatt, that they may have an old-fashioned revival, and that those who now desecrate the Sabbath may be won to Christ. Also that the Sunday school may prosper.

Mrs. J. C. P. asks prayers in behalf with "While thou livest, keep a good tongue in thy head."

Accomplishments and Opportunities

E. L. Rally Sunday. Phil. 3:7-14.

"NOT as though I had already attained." Paul was never satisfied with his achievements. No great person ever is. "A man's reach should exceed his grasp or what's a heaven for?" asks Browning. "He is a small man who can realize his ideals," says Chancellor Day. Every Epworthian knows that the past year was full of mistakes. What year is not? Every earnest effort made (and there were earnest efforts we know) will bring its own reward. He who does good is often only rewarded by the opportunity he has had to do good. We are not laboring for rewards, however, but results that shall bless posterity. This our best endeavors shall do. In the economy of God nothing is lost. The mistakes and the successes are with God. They are beyond our reach. The future challenges. The new fields call.

This is the time of year for strenuous planning and programing. The League that has a plan and program should not fail. The crispness and freshness of September days should enter the blood and awaken sluggish pulses to new activity and greater conquest. "Forgetting the things that are passed" not to dishonor them, but because they are passed. "I press toward the mark" because the future is mine to do with as I will.

Says a writer in Zion's Herald, "Keep believing in tomorrow, but never forget that yesterday made tomorrow possible. You may despise your baby-clothes today. Yesterday you could not have lived without them. Outworn methods, outworn truths—these are things treasured and honored, not despised. At the same time you cannot cramp the larger life of tomorrow in the baby-clothes of yesterday."

As Epworthians we will take off our hats to the past in reverence, but we will take off our coats to the future in work.

of the church and community of Dayton, O., and B. M. asks prayers for a revival in La Crosse, Wis.

Among the general requests are the following: healing, 75; blessing 18; wisdom, 15; prosperity, 6; conversion of relatives and friends, 75; financial aid, 16; reconciliation, 2; heart's desire, 25; guidance, 10; success, 4; position, 10; faith, 19; happiness, 11; forgiveness, 5; and peace, 5.

We have also a number of wonderful answers to prayers. Mrs. Sarah E. Ober, 4346 Sixth Ave., N. E., Seattle, Wash., writes: "I was nearly dead with a tumor and all alone, excepting my little girl, among the Indians. But God most wonderfully healed me on Thanksgiving night, so the next morning it was wholly gone. For over ten years we have trusted God for healing as well as for everything else, and He has never failed us. And God is using me here in a little Mission Sunday school, and bringing souls to Christ. I know He will use me for the Indians soon—then all my heart's desires will be satisfied."

Mrs. A. C. Andersen of Mahagi Center, Congo Belge, Africa, also acknowledges answered prayers and asks: "Please pray for our work here in Africa, that these natives may have a conviction of sin and a longing for the words of life. And that many may be brought into the fold."

And we also have acknowledgments from the following friends: A. C. H., Mrs. W. B. W., Mrs. J. H., Mrs. A., L. M., Mrs. C. P., Mother, L. M. B., M. H. J., Mrs. E. J. P., Mrs. S. F. Y., Mrs. L. P., Mrs. V. W., Mrs. L. F. E., and A. R.

A new discovery about skin beauty

Pimples, boils and other skin troubles traced to internal disorders due to lack of vitamine

YOU probably think, like many others, that the skin eruptions that so often mar a clear, beautiful skin are merely external skin troubles. But they are not.

The real cause of skin eruptions is now traced to a diet lacking in sufficient vitamine, a factor in foods supremely important to vitality and health, but unfortunately absent in many of the things we eat.

Yeast is considered today, by the highest medical scientists, a valuable addition to a vitamine-deficient diet. It is many times more plentiful in the indispensable water-soluble vitamine than any other food.

If you have an obstinate case of pimples, or any other unsightly skin trouble, you may be sure that it is caused by lack of vitamine in the things you eat. The vitamine-rich Yeast Foam will supply this vital element.

Men who are so often afflicted with boils find that Yeast Foam not only relieves them of this annoying skin affection, but so builds up their vitality as to prevent a recurrence.

Physicians are recommending two or three cakes a day with great success to those who need building up, and particularly to the many people troubled with annoying skin affections.

Don't allow yourself to be denied the benefits of Yeast Foam just because it seems new and strange that yeast can be eaten. It is a wholesome, edible food, and you will soon like the taste. Many eat the yeast cake plain; followed with a little water or milk.

It's the same Yeast Foam you know so well as a bread raiser. Begin eating a cake or two a day while awaiting more interesting information which we shall be glad to send free.

OUR MAIL-BAG

THE editors of the Christian Herald will be glad to answer any question addressed to the Mail-Bag provided it be of general interest and not merely personal. No attention will be paid to anonymous letters nor to those written with lead pencil.

Questions and Answers

R. W. F. Kyle, Tex., asks: "Will you please give through the Mail-Bag some of the testimonies of great minds for Jesus Christ?"

As these testimonies may interest others as well as R. W. F., we give a few below: Theodore Parker wrote: "He unites in himself the sublimest precepts and divinest principles, thus more than realizing the dream of prophets and sages, rising free from all prejudices of his age, nation and sect, and pours out a doctrine beautiful as the light, sublime as heaven and true as God." Goethe called Him the divine Man, the type and model of all men. Renan declared Jesus, "The most beautiful incarnation of God, God in man. Great and beautiful, a thousand times more real than insipid earthly greatness or insipid earthly beauty." Strauss called Him the "highest object we can possibly imagine. . . . Never will it be possible to rise above Him or imagine any one who shall ever be equal with Him." Lecky, the great historian, declared: "The brief record of His short years has done more to soften and regenerate mankind than all the disquisitions of philosophers or all the exhortations of materialists." Rabbi Kohler, a distinguished Jew, says, "Jesus, Keeper of the door, Friend of the sinner, Brother of the sufferer, Comfort of the sorrow-laden, Healer of the sick, Uplifter of the fallen, Lover of man, Redeemer of woman, we claim Him as our own." Napoleon declared, "Other conquerors founded their empires upon force. Jesus alone founded His empire upon love, and millions would die for Him today. I understand men. Jesus Christ was more than a man. He was divine."

Mrs. A. W. G. Vevay, Ind.: "Please explain Rev. 12: 7, 8, 9."

These verses have been much discussed by the ablest commentators. In Job 1 and 2, Satan appears in heaven as the accuser of the saints, and again in Zech. 3: 1, 2. But at Christ's coming as our Redeemer, and His appearing before God as our Advocate, Satan, the accusing adversary, could no longer appear before God against us, but was cast out judicially (Rom. 8: 33, 34). The casting out referred to in Revelations was the glorious result of Christ's triumph (see Luke 19: 38 and Coloss. 1: 20). This is a summary of the views of leading Bible expositors, as given in Jamieson, Fausset and Brown's Commentary, which adds: "It was fittingly ordered that, as the rebellion arose from unfaithful angels and their leader, so they should be overcome by faithful angels and their archangel in heaven. On earth, they are fittingly encountered and shall be overcome by the Son of Man and His armies of human saints." (Rev. 19: 14-21.) The same authority further says: "From Christ down to the millennium, Satan is judicially cast out of heaven as the accuser of the elect, and shortly before the millennium, loses his power against Israel, and has sentence of expulsion fully executed on him and his by Michael. His rage on earth is consequently the greater, his power being concentrated on it, especially toward the end, when he 'knoweth that he hath but a short time.'"

Mary R., Rensselaer, Ind. Have sent your letter to the Prayer League.

Reader, Boone, Ia. You will find the whole field of prophecy and its latter-day application treated most exhaustively and satisfactorily in the new book by Dr. Patch, entitled "Prophecy Explained," now in press and for sale by the Christian Herald.

M. F., Sacramento, Calif. The passage in Matt. 16: 24 is a searching test of character, which each may apply to himself. God's gifts, rightly used, become a blessing; abused and applied to selfish and evil purposes, they are the reverse.

Mrs. Charles Gibbs, Masonville N. J., writes: "As subscribers to your paper for the last thirty years we enjoy reading it very much. I am sending you a clipping which is self-explanatory. During our fifty years of married life the family altar has been the most prominent and successful factor. My husband for the past fifteen years has been pastor of the Christian Church at Bridgeboro, five miles from our home. During this time we have missed very few services. A few winters ago during our extra meetings which were held for five consecutive weeks we never missed a night, although we had to drive through all kinds of inclement weather. As our reward thirty-five converts were added to the great host who are traveling the narrow way. For nearly forty years, I was a teacher in the Sunday school, but for the past year and a half I have not been able to attend, owing to the fact that I have adopted two of my grandchildren."

Between 75 and 100 guests attended the golden wedding anniversary of Mr. and Mrs. Gibbs. They have 14 children living 15 grandchildren and four great-grandchildren, besides a host of friends. The Christian Herald Family join with the others in cordial good wishes.

Reader, N. Y., writes: "Are not the commandments given by the Lord, to Moses as binding now as when given to men? When I was young Sunday was a holy day, not a holiday as now. I never hear a minister preach on the Fourth Commandment."

The Christian is not under the law but under grace. This, however, does not free him from obligations; indeed, more is expected of him in the way of righteousness than if he were under the law. In some Christian churches the Decalogue is read at every forenoon service. The growing evil of desecrating the Lord's Day by making it a day of pleasure-seeking and amusement, and neglecting worship, is one that should be rebuked from every pulpit.

J. H. S. God does not tempt any one (see James 1: 13). He may permit us to be placed in positions where, if left to our own resources, we would fall; but he does not tempt us to evil. A better rendering of the passage is "Leave us not in temptation," thus asking for strength to resist.

M. E. O., Ashland, Neb., writes: "Kindly explain what is meant in I Peter 3: 19. Also, I Corinthians 15: 29."

1. The passage in I Peter 3: 19, 20 is one that has been much discussed. It is generally held that the preaching to the spirits "in prison" implies not the preaching of the Gospel, but the announcement of Christ's finished work. Nor does it imply a second day of grace. The spirits were clearly those of the Antediluvians. The passage, however, is mysterious and has puzzled Bible students in all time. Peter is the only Bible writer who mentions the occurrence, so that there are no other passages to shed light upon it. 2. Beuzel translated the familiar passage in I Cor. 15: 29 thus: "Over the dead," or "immediately upon the dead," meaning those who will be gathered to the dead immediately after baptism. Many in the ancient church put off baptism till near death. The passage probably referred to some symbolical rite of baptism, or dedication of themselves to follow the dead even to death. Another view held by some expositors is that it was a custom to baptize certain persons with the names of the dead, in the hope that they might inherit their spirit and carry on their work.

Constant Reader, Lawrence, Kansas, writes: "I was reared in a home where my father never neglected the Family Altar. I am alone in the world but have always kept up the practice of silent grace at table, with the reading of a Christian Herald Meditation. When it is impossible for some members of the family to kneel, a very pleasant and informal way is to remain sitting at the table when one or more persons may contribute a verse from the Psalms, a verse from some hymn, some helpful thought for the day. It is possible and necessary in every home."

C. P. T., South Royalton, Vt., writes: "It is a pleasure to me to assure you that we have had a simple morning service of prayer and scripture reading for many years. We find it helpful, and greatly regret that the custom of maintaining family worship seems more and more to be omitted in Christian homes. This is the more to be regretted because there is such a crying need for more Christian education in the land."

HEART STORIES

A New Book of Seven Stories

By Dr. Charles M. Sheldon
author of "IN HIS STEPS"

Dr. Sandison says:

"Dr. Sheldon's new book, entitled, 'Heart Stories,' shows his wonderful versatility in depicting the spiritual life in its most interesting phases. In these seven stories, the reader will find some of the most interesting themes.

We form the acquaintance of such characters as Andrew Stoddard, in the 'Good Fight,' who became a benefactor to his fellowmen after his own career had apparently been wrecked by an accident; Robert Arnold in 'As Heaven Views It,' whose routine, selfish nature was illumined by a vision in which he listened to the Recording Angel's record of one day of his own life; the sudden change of mind that caused the Pastor of the Church of Milton to withdraw his letter of resignation, and how it all came about is delightfully told in 'Why the Minister Remained'; the story of Rosy Calvaire, the little factory box-maker, is stirring told in 'Of Such Is the Kingdom' and is a terrible arraignment of child labor; 'Sunrise on the Mesa' is a story of the Arizona desert and the Navajo and Hopi Indians; 'His Christmas Gift' is a Christmas story of New York life and experience, and what happened at the most remarkable Christmas dinner Sidney Allen had ever attended; the whole concluding with a coal mine story entitled 'Guests of Honor,' in which a winter storm brought unexpected guests to the mine manager's family circle, who treated them as guests of honor—but the stories the reader must read for himself. The whole, delightfully and romantically told, is well adapted to reading in the family group when its members meet by the cozy fire on winter evenings. All admirers of Dr. Sheldon's world-famous book, 'In His Steps,' should read this new book.

That Good Old Clothcraft Serge— Like an Old Friend, it Wears Well

OF all the suits you've ever bought, the one you get this season must have the biggest value, it must look the best, wear the best—in a word, it must give you the most you've ever received for your clothing dollars.

Yet it must be priced to fit your pocketbook.

Now, just what kind of a suit fits these specifications? You know the answer—that good old Clothcraft Serge.

There's the clothing "buy" for today! Like an old friend it wears well. It holds its shape, its creases stay in, it retains its sturdy, sensible appearance longer than another suit purchased at the same time.

So if you ask the Clothcraft retailer in your town for a Clothcraft Serge Special you will get more actual value in a suit than ever before.

Clothcraft is able to give this "better clothes" value because of advanced methods that produce worth-while savings.

First, Clothcraft has concentrated on the making of a few simplified models—eliminating the fads and frills which many men object to and which only increase production costs.

Second, Clothcraft gets rock-bottom prices on raw materials because the enormous output permits quantity buying.

And third, Clothcraft has simplified its manufacturing processes in many ingenious ways, so that a few cents are saved here and a few cents there—and all these mount up into large savings.

The benefit of these savings are YOURS—in the form of a better suit at a lower price.

Actual samples of the Clothcraft Serges (brown, gray and blue) will be sent you FREE on request, in a little folder that will vitally interest you.

How Clothcraft Savings Come About

Combining two or more operations here, eliminating an unnecessary operation there, speeding up still another operation elsewhere—Clothcraft by ceaseless effort effects savings that in the production of a complete suit of clothes total no inconsiderable amount. In making pockets, for example, the operator uses a machine with a double needle and an automatic knife that trims as the needle sews. This makes a better pocket, saves time and eliminates two costly hand operations. Again, in the sewing-in of sleeves, Clothcraft uses a machine with a cylindrical base that enables the operator to distribute the fullness more accurately than on a flat bed; thus it speeds up the work and saves "overhead." Through just such ingenious short-cuts, Clothcraft effects appreciable savings. YOU get the benefit of these savings in the form of a better suit-value at a lower price.

A National Crisis in Unemployment

Conditions Are Serious, but Hopeful Aspects Are Present

THE announcement made by Herbert Hoover, Secretary of Commerce, on August 28, that President Harding will call a National conference on Unemployment at Washington in the near future, has caused universal approval and relief. As long ago as last March it was felt by social and church authorities that the time had come for convening such a conference, but the new Administration had not got its start. At last, however, the nation is aroused to the fact that America, too, is engulfed in the world's economic prostration. While this country is in the most fortunate position of any of the great powers, and is most able to come to the assistance of a starving people, such as the Russians, it has a colossal problem of need at home, which, together with imperative calls from overseas, will tax its resources to the utmost.

The unemployment situation in the United States September 1 is approximately as follows: Between 5,000,000 and 6,000,000 men and women are out of work, and conditions over the country as a whole are not improving. The Industrial Employment Survey Bulletin, of the United States Employment Service, Department of Labor, for August, which is just off the press, announces a steady decline in employment. In a detailed study of 1,428 manufacturing concerns from every section of the country, employing over 501 men each, and representing a total of 1,628,134 employees on January 31, 1921, there was a decrease of 117,924 by July 31. This is indicative of what is taking place. One-sixth of the working population of the country is unemployed, and the curve of unemployment is as yet slowly descending.

THE report of the Department of Labor by territorial areas is instructive. New England reports widespread unemployment, part time in practically all lines, and retail sales falling off. In the Middle Atlantic States, including Pennsylvania, there is little change. The great steel industries of the Pittsburgh district are on an extremely low basis of production. The East North Central District (centering in Chicago) reports pessimism as to the immediate future, due to deferred industrial improvement and unsatisfactory retail trade. These districts cover the great manufacturing centers where the situation is worst.

The South Atlantic States, from Maryland to Florida, which include the great cotton mills of the South, report textiles and steel not improving, coal at a low ebb, but building active, railroad employment increasing, and an undertone of confidence.

The great agricultural states of the Northern Mississippi Valley, from Missouri and Kansas to North Dakota and Minnesota, report a bumper wheat crop, plenty of harvesters and much road-building. These favorable factors have relieved unemployment and stimulated other industries. Much the same conditions exist in Oklahoma, Arkansas, Texas and Louisiana, although serious unemployment exists in most industrial and shipping centers of these states.

The Mountain District, extending from Canada to the Mexican border, reports mining depressed, but agriculture and other industries encouraging. The Pacific Division, including California, Oregon and Washington, reports widespread unemployment, farm help plentiful and a partial recovery in lumber.

The West is fortunate in that there is much road-building and public improvements. Wichita, for example, is building 1,000 residences, 2 theaters, several school buildings, commercial structures, a grain elevator and thirty miles of road. Winona, Minn., and Sacramento, are likewise saved by public works. Enormous road construction is under way throughout Oregon, Washington and the northern and central mountain states, which relieves the strain in those areas. The manufacturing cities of the East and Middle West, however, are almost solidly depressed.

The picture, while dark, is not without hopeful aspects. The one great fact is that out of an industrial population of 30,000,000 workers at least 24,000,000 are working, although many of them on part time, and are, therefore, in a position to help carry those who are out of work until industry revives. Of the five to six million out of work, it is to be remembered that between two and three million, or 10 per cent. of the total, are idle at any given time. This is due to many causes, the principal of which are,

By REV. WORTH M. TIPPY, D.D.

(Secretary of the Commission on the Church and Social Service) voluntary quitting of work, changes in employment, sickness, business failures, bad management, seasonal work, shiftlessness, approaching age.

The situation has improved in the agricultural states and in a few industrial centers. Public works, especially road-building, is taking up the slack in a few states, and some communities have found a way to finance building construction to relieve the shortage in housing, and this is operating to reduce unemployment. The reports indicate also a great amount of part-time work. Employers very generally are trying to hold their employees together, distributing work so as to make it possible for families to live.

The industrial depression began in June and July of 1920, now fourteen months ago. How has it been possible for so many men to be idle over so long a time without bread-lines and pronounced social unrest? No man knows enough about America as a whole to answer that question fully, but the following considerations answer it broadly:

The workers, especially the foreign-born workers,

THE call by the President for a national conference on unemployment and the publication of surveys of unemployment made in all parts of the country have centered interest in this big problem. Probably no man is in closer touch with the whole situation than Dr. Tippy and we asked him to give us his impressions in this article. In the main, he seems to feel that things will be worse before they are better. Many signs of improvement in the great agricultural belt and an awakened sense of responsibility by employers in industrial centers, however, make us feel that Dr. Tippy may be unduly apprehensive as to the future. Reports that come to the office of the Christian Herald indicate, in fact, that the tide already has turned and that in most parts of the country the economic pressure is lightening in some small measure.

laid aside money during the war and for a year and a half following the armistice, and they have had this to draw upon. These reserves are now becoming exhausted. Applications for work and for financial assistance at the Charity Organization Society, New York, during this August increased greatly over August of 1920, indicating that savings are gone and the pinch is being felt.

In the second place the workers help each other. Those in a family who are employed carry along those who are out of work. Credits have also been extended all along the line by retail shops, but the possibilities of these credits are limited.

Employers as a rule have been anxious to care for their men and their families. They have learned that it pays to keep the working force together. They are strongly influenced also by human considerations. Mr. Gompers is wrong in expressing wholesale condemnation of employers, although there is truth in what he says. I have been in most large industrial centers and in many of the smaller ones during the year, and I have been impressed and heartened by the spirit of employers. Instead of taking advantage of the situation thousands of firms are jeopardizing their capital to keep men at work.

IN SPITE of all alleviating circumstances, however, the fact remains that between five and six million men and women are out of work, with the situation not improving. Their resources have been largely exhausted from months of idleness, and winter is approaching. Cheap lodging-houses are filled to capacity and in the cities thousands of men are sleeping in parks. The nation faces probably the gravest unemployment crisis in its history. The time has come for action on a large scale.

I have given these reassuring facts to make it clear that we are strong enough to do whatever needs to be done, but we shall need all our strength. Recovery will be slow, and it has not yet set in, for we have not yet hit bottom. It is a terrible thing for five million bread-winners to be out of work for many months. I wish every man who is employed or making money could sit in the office of an Associated Charities Association, and see with his own eyes these anxious, intelligent, dependable men and women seeking help.

The President's Conference on Unemployment will shortly give out recommendations to the nation, to which all good and patriotic people will give heed. Meanwhile, certain things which should be done are clear and admit of no delay.

Relative should help relative; neighbor, neighbor; friend, friend.

Employers should go the limit in keeping men at work, especially men with families or dependents.

Industrial communities which have not done so should at once study the problem of public works, with a view to giving employment on productive work.

The local Charity Organization and relief societies of most industrial centers will be able to care for necessitous cases, if they are given the funds. One of the first things to do, therefore, in every community is to provide this finance. It must be big-visioned and generous, or it will miserably fail of its opportunity.

THE present crisis offers a great opportunity to the Church of Christ to express the Christian spirit in quick and generous action. First of all it is a time for intensified pastoral visitation. Homes in which the bread-winners have been long out of work are sorely tried. The friendship of the Church is then a great comfort and strength. A Church is also strong enough to tide over any of its families known to be in actual need. If it does not do so its religion is but skin deep. Under ordinary circumstances enough work can be obtained to keep going those men whose families are in actual distress, if pastors will call up factories and stores for partial employment, or if they will organize to find odd jobs about homes. The men's club or brotherhood might assume the responsibility.

The church people, especially pastors, should not hesitate to take the lead in arousing and organizing their communities, first to discover by investigation just what the need may be, and second to set up measures to meet the need. The churches are recognized as disinterested, and they should not hesitate to act. If they do take the lead they should get all the forces of the community together, being careful to include labor.

The unfortunate people who depend on the missions and the Salvation Army should not be forgotten. These societies will need reinforcement during the winter. If necessary, church kitchens and social rooms should be opened, but as a rule this is neither necessary nor expedient. Sensational and critical methods should be avoided. To be out of work and forced to accept help is enough humiliation.

One can not refrain from a word as to the more distant future. Mr. Hoover is wise in proposing that the National Conference on Unemployment shall discuss methods by which employers and employees may establish better relations. That is enormously important; seven million men were idle on an average of thirty days each during 1920 because of strikes. Deep industrial evils underlie unemployment, many or all of which may be removed or greatly alleviated. This is a time to re-establish the Federal system of employment exchanges.

The British system of unemployment insurance, and the systematic organization of public works in relation to unemployment, should be studied by Federal, state and municipal officials. Corporations should prepare to set aside sinking funds to provide for their employees in periods of idleness as well as for dividends on idle capital. Underneath all lies the study of economic depressions and the better co-ordination of the industry of the country as a whole.

Iceland, an "Almost Perfect State"

A REMOTE island nation where war is a distant rumor; where capitalists are few and the poor still fewer; where there is no such thing as illiteracy; where daylight-saving is not necessary, because there is daylight most of the time—this sounds like the "almost perfect state," but in reality it is Iceland.

Before the war this island country of 93,000 inhabitants belonged to Denmark. Like the other Scandinavian nations, Denmark very early in the war became like the lamb between a wolf and a bear. She could not move without fear of becoming a prey to one side or the other, could hardly help herself, much less her island possession lying remote from the world in the northern seas.

Iceland was left to manage her own affairs. On account of long winters and short, rather cold summers, the island must import grain from other countries, while it exports meat and fish. Now the people of Iceland, descendants of those ancient Vikings, each of whom was as free as a king, have a passionate love for freedom. They had long wished to take their foreign affairs as well as the rule of the homeland into their own hands. Here was an opportunity which fired the enthusiasm of the liberal party and the optimistic young people. Envoys were sent to New York and London to provide for protection of the trade from the Allies. Their requests were heeded no less than those from the big nations.

In the summer of 1918 a committee elected partly by the Danish and partly by the Icelandic Parliament met in Reykjavik, the capital of Iceland. As a result of this convocation Iceland became, on December 1, 1918, an independent and sovereign state, in union with Denmark. Since 1915 the Icelanders have had their own flag, which is a blue field with a red cross in the center and white stripes between the blue and the red. On December 1, 1918, this became a marine as well as a home flag, and occasionally can be seen waving on Icelandic boats in New York harbor. The national emblem for the new state is to bear the images of four guardian spirits—a dragon, a bird, a bull, and a giant, which, according to an ancient legend, saved Iceland from the attack of the Danish king, Harold Gormsson.

THIS old story of how the guardian spirits of Iceland kept out the foreign invader might be said to typify the Icelanders' love of independence and his reluctance to allow the entrance into his country of any foreign elements which might endanger his nationality and native tongue. For the modern Iceland is not. Immigration is discouraged, for fear the incoming foreigners would not submit to the Icelandic customs; the schools would have to use the foreign language; and the Icelandic tongue would become confused with foreign words.

To those who have been brought up in a country whither foreigners have been invited in, and where amalgamations of languages, races and nationalities are frequent, this may sound amazing. The Icelanders have never seen an Eskimo, an Indian or a colored man in their country. The Mongolian and Slavic people are also unknown there. The purest branch of the Germanic or Gothic race has struck root in this attractive though somewhat sterile island. There they have for centuries kept pure the tongue which generated the modern Scandinavian tongues, and which might also be called one parent to the English language.

There they have written the history of the whole

Teutonic or Gothic race and given it to the world. There they have preserved the myths and religious traditions of the race. There they have fought ice, fire, and disaster of various kinds, unaided by the world beyond their shores. There they have finally become a prosperous, self-governing people. The mere thought of risking their nationality for the development of manufacturing institutions makes every real Iceland sick.

This reluctance to admit foreign labor into the country of course increases the problems of industrial development. In the utilization of the natural water power of the island lies one of the greatest possibilities for its future prosperity. Glacier-fed rivers, flowing down from the white-capped mountains through rocky riverbeds, have resulted in great numbers of remarkable waterfalls. In former days these were not thought of as means of producing power; they were looked at only by the eyes of wanderers, visiting them occasionally as one of the great phenomena of creation. The devotee saw in them the image of God's power; the musician heard the voice of God in the most harmonious melodies; the poet felt their sympathy and spoke to them as friends and comrades; lovers told them of their happiness; the sorrowful and weary sat at their feet, forgetting themselves in admiration. But the practical man came and watched them, calculating how many horsepower each had, and how much money it would cost to "bridle" them for the use of the people. In many cases these practical men were travelers from other lands, who had eyes to see their value as sources of enormous wealth.

"How interesting," such a man would muse, "to know if they were to be bought! Even if one did not utilize them, it would at least be great fun to be the owner of a waterfall in Iceland!" A detour, to see the owner of the land lying near the waterfall, would be made. The innocent farmer could not resist the gold. The traveler would go triumphant on his way.

WHEN the government woke up to the fact that a great many waterfalls were in the possession of foreign speculators, the Icelandic Parliament, the Althing, in 1917 appointed a committee to study the question and to plan how the country itself might make use of its waterfalls. Investigation showed that already a few small towns had for several years worked the nearby waterfalls to produce electric lights, while some farmers had also been so "extravagant" as to make use of the "white coal" for the illumination and heating of their farmhouses, and even for cooking. A few small factories were run by power produced in the same way. But the capital of the country, Reykjavik, is supplied only with gas. The mistake of using gas instead of utilizing the water power close at hand, was realized in 1917 when the price of coal, most of which is imported from Scotland, soared to $85 a ton.

A few corporations for the development of enterprises in connection with the waterfalls were formed in Denmark and Norway, in which a few Icelanders were partners. The government of Iceland could not be arbitrary to the point of refusing to sanction these transactions.

After having carried on in—

CHAPTER VI

A Story of a City Church

By MARION HARLAND

Illustrated by William C. McNulty

THE Stirred Nest" is a story—and a tragedy—as old as Eden, yet so common today as to be sickeningly true, except as to details. "I had hoped to die in my nest" is a moan wring from the heart of the dispossessed home-lover today, as naturally as the like lament broke from the lips of the afflicted patriarch countless centuries ago.

Stuart Haile had breathed it in the ear of the all-pitying Father as he addressed and sealed the letter that conveyed his acceptance of the call to the Banner Church after a struggle as real and severe as the wrestle at the ford of Jabbok, and it as truly left a life-long trace upon the mortal man.

Like the good soldier he was, Haile carried himself right gallantly in the sight of the small world whose eyes were upon him. After one frank outpouring of his racked soul to his wife, he made no moan, and she seconded him bravely. To the protest and tearful petitions rained upon her, as she stood between her husband and the throng of parishioners and neighbors, she had but one reply in spirit and in substance:

"You can not love us more than we love you. The parting can not be a greater trial to you than it is to us. But we are persuaded that we are obeying the call of God to another field of labor for Him."

She said, and thought she spoke truly, that the heavier part of the burden fell upon her husband. His was the responsibility of the decision, and if he had misunderstood the Divine will, he would bear the penalty of it so long as he lived. Underlying the fierce energy with which she threw herself into the work of demolition and reconstruction of domestic plans was the fervent prayer "without ceasing" that strength and light might not be wanting in the dark and cloudy day. Even Stuart did not guess what it cost her to be her cheery, voluble self within sight of all. God knew! That should have been enough for the willing spirit, but the flesh suffered sore.

The removal to the city was to be in the middle of December. Two weeks before the day set for the fitting, she had a call from Mrs. Barrows, the wife of her husband's old friend. The two women had met several times in town, and twice Dr. and Mrs. Barrows had run out for a day at the Parsonage. This time the elder of the twain had a special errand. She broached the subject within five minutes after she had taken her seat in the library, which as yet bore no signs of the contemplated upheaval.

"This doesn't look much like moving day," she remarked, glancing approvingly around the well-appointed room. "I was almost afraid to come today for fear of interfering with the awful business of packing up and all that."

"We like to keep up the fiction of a home as long as possible," smiled the hostess. As was her wont she wore a white morning dress; her hair, neck-gear and all the accessories of the simple toilette were in perfect order. There were no signs of flurry or unrest in demeanor and speech.

"Not to do it would not be fair to Mr. Haile and the children," she added.

"You are altogether right, my dear, but it isn't every woman who has the common sense to understand that and the very uncommon sense to practice it. My husband has told me that you are a capital housewife and manager. I can readily believe it. I ought not to trespass upon your time and strength just now, but I came out to Marlinton expressly to beg that you and Mr. Haile will be our guests at the time of the Unique Demonstration—that is the name it goes by with Mr. Ford and his helpers—to come off in the church parlors next Tuesday week. Come to us on Monday, if you can, and bring the children if convenient.

What Has Gone Before

SILAS FORD, the dominant figure in the fashionable Banner Church in New York City, is profoundly impressed while on a visit to the home of Robert Lawson in Marlinton, a few miles distant, by the preaching of Rev. Stuart Haile, whose ten-year pastorate there has been extraordinarily happy and successful. The leaders of the Banner Church have determined on the resignation of their pastor, Rev. Dr. Samuel Stetson, because they believe that at the age of sixty-three he is too old for the best interests of a modern city church conducted with strict regard for business-like efficiency, and a committee goes to Marlinton to hear and see the minister whom Mr. Ford had proclaimed to be a "find." Rev. Mr. Haile's first intimation of the call comes in a letter from Rev. Dr. Calvin Barrows, a New York pastor, who urges its acceptance because of the larger opportunities for Christian service. Mr. Ford follows it up with a personal call on the minister, who regretfully decides to accept.

We have lots of room. Now, don't begin to remonstrate! As your old friends, we have a right to claim you, and will take no refusal."

Recovering from her surprise at the invitation and the warmth with which it was expressed, Mrs. Haile explained that, anticipating the expediency of passing one night at least in town, she had engaged an elderly and trustworthy woman, one of their parishioners who was very fond of the boy and girl, to care for them during the absence of the parents.

Mrs. Barrows nodded satisfactorily.

"That will dispose of the little folks, and leave you free for The Occasion. And you must come to us for a day and night at the least, and as much longer as you can. I am hoping that I may be of some service to you after we get to be neighbors. You see, I am an old stager and, maybe, can give you a few points with regard to—well, things! that crop out in the life of a pastor's wife—Heaven help them all! Mr. Barrows and I are both very fond of Mr. Haile and charmed at the idea of having him—and you—in New York. I don't mean to be officious, but you will let me play the older sister to you if you ever need me in any capacity. You comprehend my intentions?"

"I do—perfectly, and am more grateful to you than I can express. Of course Marlinton is, in a manner, a sort of suburb of New York. Every village within a hundred miles of great Gotham is that, you know. But we are quiet people with ideas upon some subjects handed down to us from ancestors—particularly where churchly usages are concerned. For example—you see how eagerly I catch at your sisterly offer—as to this—twain demonstration of Mr. Ford's, it is to be a full-dress affair, I suppose? Before we go into particulars, let me say how very gratefully we shall accept your most kind invitation. We had expected to spend that night at a hotel—"

MRS. BARROWS' gesture of horrified protest required no backing of words, but she supplied it. In strong terms so evidently sincere that the auditor received them in all good faith, she reiterated her invitation and the desire to be of service to the newcomers according to the best of her ability, passing without preamble to Mrs. Haile's last question.

"Full dress—of course! Not dancing costume, since the exhibition is to be in a church drawing-room. But dress coats for all the men who happen to own them, and evening gowns—not too décolleté!—for the women. Can I be of any service to you in the line of selecting a dressmaker, or in any other way?"

Mrs. Haile laughed good-humoredly.

"It happens that I have an evening-gown I have never worn which was made by a woman who served her apprenticeship with a New York modiste. Would you mind"—lured into intimacy by the unmistakable friendliness of her guest—"if I brought it down to show it to you? You may be willing to tell if it will be too—well!—youthful for a matron of my age." Receiving a cordial affirmative, she tripped out of the room, and presently returned with the garment in question over her arm.

Mrs. Barrows uttered an exclamation of delight as the gown was spread out upon the lounge at full length. It was a white Japanese fabric, exquisite in texture and softness, embroidered richly upon the waist and sleeves with white silk and silver. The owner explained briefly in displaying it that a navy officer, a friend of her husband, had brought the material home after a voyage. It was selected for him by an English woman resident in Japan.

"Of course!" commented Mrs. Barrows, touching the embroidered sleeve tenderly. "No man would know enough to select it. And you look so well in white. Mr. Haile likes to see you wear it, doesn't he?"

Anita blushed.

"How did you guess that?"

"Because I know him and I have heard him talk of you. Not that he ever alluded to your dress. My dear! You could not have chosen more wisely. How proud the Bannerites will be of you! A word in your ear, my child! Don't give them an opportunity to patronize you now or ever. I know some of the foremost of the workers in that church. Mr. Barrows shouted with laughter when I named one of them, whom you will know before long—the Leading Lady of the Troupe." That isn't for publication you know. She is a handsome widow millionairess in her own right and a born commander-in-chief. Not a bad sort, though. She is liberal and energetic and doesn't expect anybody else to work as she does. You'll like her—on the whole. By the way, perhaps Mr. Haile has professional scruples against wearing a dress-coat—a claw-hammer tail,"

While the room rang with resounding palms and exclamations, Dr. Stetson made an effort to rise, fell back in his chair, and covered his face with his hands

A Personal Word

ALITTLE over a year and a half ago the Editor-in-Chief of the Christian Herald, as he took over the new task of an editor after thirty years in the pastorate, said a few words to the family of Herald readers and among other things asked his readers to remember that he would no doubt say some things the readers of the paper would not agree to, and also asked for honest criticism.

The readers of the Christian Herald are evidently men and women with very decided views of their own. In that respect they are somewhat like the editor. And during the eighteen months past, the letters that have come to him personally have expressed very frankly the feelings of the subscribers either for or against the views often held by the editorials. It is somewhat gratifying to the editor that letters of approval have outnumbered those of disapproval or condemnation. Editors are just human beings like farmers and carpenters and grocers and doctors, and they are just as much pleased to have their opinions and convictions praised as for example, you are.

This seems like a good time to say a few things that the readers of a paper like the Christian Herald probably know already, but are willing good-naturedly to let the editor say again.

Editorials, like any other kind of public utterance, are not infallible or free from the possibility of mistake or error. As for example, the editorial a little while ago about the agitation in India led by Ghandi was severely criticized by a subscriber in India, as full of error in giving to Ghandi the influence that was accorded him. Yet the very next mail brought a letter from a friend in India corroborating all that the editorial had emphasized, and added even more to the statements. All of which goes to show how hard it is for the newspapers to get the exact facts always. For example, what is very true of the social and political conditions in one part of Russia is contradicted in another part. One of New York's greatest dailies has lately been taken to task for giving very false accounts of conditions relating to the Soviet government, and exactly diverse statements about Russia are being made by different writers in different magazines.

Mr. Bryan's article provoked considerable criticism, but several correspondents were specially pleased with it. Of course, the readers of the Herald are aware of the fact that the editor does not necessarily hold the same views that are held by the contributors, any more than the staff of editors on the paper are always agreed on matters of philosophy or politics or plans for social reform.

The editor is taking occasion to remind his readers that if he makes mistakes, or says things that cut across the grain with his readers, he is simply claiming his right to express his own convictions, and if they are wrong, to say so later on and keep after the truth as fast as it is made known to him. But he is not infallible, he is not an encyclopedia of knowledge that never makes mistakes, he is very human, and sometimes purposely exaggerates in order to make a mark, possibly leaning sometimes toward caricature in order to make people do their own questioning.

After all, the editor is thankful for the kindly letters, even those of protest, that have come to him. He can not recall many communications that were angry or hardly impolite. He has tried to answer all letters that were capable of answer. But he is taking occasion here to reply to the hundreds of letters that he has received during the last eighteen months, and which he has not been able to answer personally. Thank you, members of the Christian Herald Family, for your frank and open criticism and commendation. The editor hopes to profit by them both.

CHARLES M. SHELDON.

Why Not Try It?

ONE Saturday afternoon lately a remarkable meeting was held in Hyde Park, London. First there was a parade, led by a choir and a band of music. Then the marching thousands were grouped in front of seven stands and arranged in a great circle, and from the platforms forty-nine speakers delivered addresses on the social message of Christianity. At the close a very unusual series of resolu-

For Peace Endorsement

THE forces of the Church are rolling up a nearly unanimous demand that the Washington Conference, to convene on November 11, find a way to world peace through disarmament. The Peace Endorsement movement inaugurated under the auspices of the Christian Herald has extended into every section of the country and is contributing largely to a sudden awakening to the necessity of a public demonstration of the people's will. The men and women of the United States are convinced that it is unnecessary for them to exist under a burden of war expenditures that exceeds 75 per cent. of the total national outlay each year, and they are determined that some measures for relief be taken.

If you want to join in this movement, make a copy of the resolutions which have appeared in previous issues of the Christian Herald and have them signed by your pastor and church board as representative of the congregation. Then send the signed resolutions to "Peace Endorsement Committee," Christian Herald, Bible House, New York City. At the same time arrange with your pastor that a part of each service on November 6 be devoted to a consideration of disarmament and world peace.

The time before the Conference meets is short. Do not delay.

tions was read simultaneously from all the platforms. These resolutions recognized "the collapse of the existing economic, industrial and social order," and "the blindness of statesmanship," and urged all to recognize the fact that the true solution of the situation could be found only by applying the principles of Christianity. They further declared expressly that "the persistent refusal to apply these principles of truth, justice and brotherly love is a denial of Jesus Christ, who lived and died for their establishment on earth." Therefore the meeting called upon all Christian people to find in the failure of the old system a supreme opportunity for the building up of the new order, brotherly co-operation.

This great gathering was made of all classes. There were the representatives of many religions, including most of the leading Protestant denominations, together with Catholics, Unitarians, and Quakers. On the platforms were many of the foremost Christian ministers in Great Britain, college presidents, professors, and others. There was no advocacy of violence. The whole demonstration took place in clear view of Kensington Palace and only a few minutes' walk from the Houses of Parliament. And the outstanding feature of the entire occasion was the proclamation of Christianity as the true solvent of all the troubles of the world.

In how many of our own public gatherings do we fail to recognize Jesus Christ and His teachings as the real solution of our difficulties? Can we not point to many tense situations, and to many a clash between capital and labor which, if the Master's teachings had been applied, might have been averted and pacific adjustment reached? Might not the whole trouble between miners and militia in the Mingo area of West Virginia have been averted, and the trouble healed without bloodshed if the spirit and teachings of Christ had been applied by both owners and men?

There are many who hold that a clearer understanding of the West Virginia situation would reveal that all that is needed to set matters right is the application of simple justice, which has not even been attempted. Instead of a free and impartial inquiry, the arm of force has been rigorously used with lamentable results, when the whole trouble might have been cleared and lawlessness and suffering avoided.

Brewers On Top

DURING the war, an English farmer was arrested for feeding his best grade of barley to his pigs, instead of selling it to the brewers. His case was tried before the board of magistrates in the farmer's town, and he, being a confirmed prohibitionist, pleaded his own case, and asked not to be judged strictly by the letter of the law, inasmuch as the army needed pork, as much as beer, and he was providing it with an essential article of food, and therefore he was a patriotic citizen of the Empire. The board of magistrates took his case under advisement for over two hours, but finally brought in a verdict of guilty, and fined the farmer twenty-five pounds, which he was obliged to pay.

At about the same time, a London restaurant keeper in the business of feeding thousands of dock laborers, who were very important to the carrying on of the war, received a consignment of sugar very much needed in the restaurant, and paid for in advance by the restaurant keeper. But the director of the port of London commandeered all the sugar at the request of the brewers and turned over the entire shipload to them.

All through the war, the brewers' goods had right of way on English railways, and merchants had the pleasure of seeing their goods sidetracked while the brewers' cars rolled quickly on their way through the merchants' towns and by their warehouses.

At the present moment the cable dispatches say that drunkenness in England has increased by 65 per cent. this last year. A letter to the editor from a prominent official in the government of Great Britain says that the brewers are apparently more powerful with the government than they have ever been, and he is pessimistic about anything short of a complete reversal of all public sentiment being great enough to bring about prohibition or anything near to it.

It is not easy for the average American citizen to realize the social, political and even religious power of the established brewer in England. It looks at present as if the liquor forces were very much on top in Great Britain. Perhaps nothing will bring him down except the economic loss which England will inevitably sustain if the drinking habits of the people rob the workers of their efficiency, and compel the business interests to take notice that other countries are beating England in the market. If that becomes an issue, as seems likely at the rate drunkenness is increasing, Great Britain will have to reverse her long-continued servility to the brewers, and they will have to come down from their bad eminence, or England herself will have to yield commercially to the nations that have adopted and are enforcing prohibition with increased efficiency for productiveness and economic wealth.

The Law of Kindness

BROTHERLY kindness, the solvent of the world's woes, the sovereign healer of antagonisms, is already having its way in Russia. It is the same spirit which was illustrated in the parable of the Good Samaritan and which recognizes every man in distress as our neighbor and worthy of a helping hand and a kindly word, regardless of all differences and distinctions and even of past conduct. In the case of Russia the fact of the application of this Christly principle is the outstanding thing. How little we hear today of the plans for overturning world civilization, which were so rife only a few months ago. All bitterness seems to have died out in the presence of the terrible affliction Russia is called to face. Hostility among nations has suddenly been transformed to hospitality, and following America's sympathetic leadership, they are now vying with each other in earnest efforts to save the perishing multitudes who were lately enemies.

We are glad that our own land is at the front of this greatest of benevolences, and all the more that Russia is the beneficiary. Our relief ships, flying the Stars and Stripes, which brought the first carloads of American flour and milk, cereal and sugar to Riga and Revel, were but the advance-guards of the squadrons now on the way. What a glorious thing to be assured that those first shipments of ours will feed approximately 30,000 and that the 6,000 cases of milk will save at least half that number of little children's lives! Our help has already reached Petrograd and we may hope soon to hear that it is in Moscow, where the starving multitudes from the surrounding country are sitting in the streets anxiously waiting for its coming.

We in America have faith that Russia can be saved, and that when the storm of suffering is past, it will be seen that the armies of helpfulness have not only kept her people alive, but that they have been given a new vision of the meaning of brotherly kindness. So may good for all come through Russia's suffering, and a brighter day dawn for her unfortunate people.

The World News of the Week

Federal Troops Restore Peace in West Virginia Coal-Fields

THE disorders in the Mingo coal-fields of West Virginia, where for months the United Mine Workers and the operators of non-union mines have been engaged in a bitter struggle which has been marked by numerous fatalities, have reached a stage of open warfare which has made necessary the despatch of Federal troops to the district.

With thousands of armed men lined up in battle array and fatal clashes between outposts a daily occurrence as the miners threatened to invade the non-union area, President Harding issued a proclamation commanding "all persons engaged in said unlawful and insurrectionary proceedings to disperse and retire peaceably to their respective abodes" on or before noon of September 1. This action was the preliminary step required by the Constitution before sending Federal troops into a state to restore order, the West Virginia governor having appealed for aid because he lacked forces adequate to deal with the situation.

The time limit fixed by the President passed with the armed bands still in their positions; and Brigadier-General Harry H. Bandholtz, commander of the newly created military district of Washington, which includes the Mingo district, telegraphed from Charleston a request for Federal troops. Meanwhile a light bombing squadron, consisting of fifteen airplanes, had been sent from Langley Field to Charleston; and three infantry regiments awaited only the order to entrain, so that the Federal action was prompt when word was given for intervention.

No resistance was offered to the Federal troops as they reached the mining area, and several hundreds of those in the armed bands surrendered, while others scattered to their homes.

The number of casualties in the skirmishes preceding the despatch of Federal soldiers could only be guessed at, but rumors that forty or fifty miners had been killed were discounted and it was believed the loss of life had been twelve or fifteen. Only scouts had been engaged in the actual fighting along the fifteen-mile battle front, and in the wooded, mountainous country it was easy to find cover, so that losses were light. The defensive force of mine guards, deputy sheriffs, state troopers and volunteers was estimated at 1,400 and was armed with machine-guns, while the number of would-be invaders was placed at 5,000.

A Senate committee began an inquiry into the West Virginia troubles several months ago and is to resume its labors in a few days. So far it has not fixed the responsibility for a situation which is a disgrace to the nation, and it is to be expected that a considerable period will elapse before it reports. The inhabitants of the district are largely Americans of old stock and the avowed issue of the struggle has been recognition of the union, the mine-owners having resisted bitterly the attempts to unionize the district.

At Work on Silesian Issue

THE Council of the League of Nations to which the Silesian controversy was referred after the British and French Premiers had been unable to agree on a compromise, has in turn referred the dispute to a commission of four in which none of the nations most interested is represented. This commission—consisting of Paul Hymans, Belgium; Dr. V. K. Wellington Koo, China; Count Quinones de Leon, Spain; and Dr. Gaston de Cunha, Brazil—began its work immediately after the Council had adjourned, and was attempting to get away from all the controversies which previously have blocked a settlement. This commission will need to study the situation thoroughly and is authorized to hear all experts except those who already have been involved in the discussions, so that an early report is improbable regarding the situation which so seriously threatened the Franco-British entente.

When the commission has decided on the basis of settlement which it considers fair, its recommendations will be submitted to the full Council of the League for final decision. On this Council, the representative of any one nation can block action, so to the casual observer the issue appears little nearer settlement than when Lloyd George and Briand disagreed.

The old Polish-Lithuanian dispute over Vilna, which the League has been attempting to settle for many months, cropped up again at the Council's session and there was elation over a belief that it has been adjusted by dividing the disputed territory into two Lithuanias, that of the district of Kovno to be independent and that of the district of Vilna to be under Polish supervision. This elation proved to be premature, however, as it had not been approved by both of the interested parties.

ONE OF THE TENT VILLAGES IN WHICH THE FAMILIES OF MINGO STRIKERS ARE LIVING
Many have known no other homes for months, as the labor troubles in this coal-field developed into what President Harding termed "unlawful and insurrectionary proceedings"

Obregon Again Rejects Treaty

THAT Mexico continues to refuse its assent to the conditions for recognition laid down by Secretary Hughes several weeks ago was shown by the message of President Obregon to the Mexican Congress. In it he reiterated that the signing of a treaty with the United States is "neither possible, convenient, nor necessary, and is contrary to Mexican constitutional precepts, in that it creates special privileges for Americans"—a declaration which brought prolonged applause from the members of Congress and spectators. He asserted that the terms to be imposed by the United States prior to recognition were unjustified and said Mexico asked for recognition only on the grounds of its legal and governmental ability to fulfill its international obligations, and cited the achievements of his régime in restoring order.

A recent decision by the Mexican Supreme Court that Article 27 of the Constitution is not to be interpreted retroactively offered hope of a settlement of one of the main points to be covered in a treaty, in the view of Washington, since it may afford a sufficiently comprehensive guarantee against confiscation of the property of Americans. But this decision does not cover many matters which were to be included in the treaty and it was held in State Department circles that a treaty would be the best means of assuring thorough understanding between the two countries.

THE INVITATION IS CORDIALLY ACCEPTED

Harding on Disarmament

THERE was a note of optimism and yet of pessimism regarding the ultimate possibilities of disarmament in an address which President Harding delivered at the opening of the fall term of the Army War College.

"No matter where the best aspirations of the world may lead us," the President said, "no matter what tremendous and gratifying progress is made, there may never be a time without the necessity for armed forces in every government."

"I believe with all my heart we are coming to a time when we are going to diminish the burden of armament. I think there will be less of armies and less of navies. I wish it with all my heart, but there never can come a time when there is not a requisite agency for the maintenance of law and authority and for national defense. . .

"It has been a slow proceeding, and I believe we of America, without unseemly boasting, can say we have come the nearest to unselfish, conscientious warfare of any people of the world, and I pledge you now you will never be called to service during the present Administration for any war that you could not enter with all your heart."

Fighting Resumed in Belfast

IRELAND'S period of quiet under the truce arranged to permit peace negotiations has been rudely disturbed by a recurrence of street fighting in Belfast, where the factions never have observed the truce too loyally. Starting in streets in which the residents are of mixed political views and bickerings frequent, the clashes spread until a large portion of the city was involved and the opposing forces were firing at each other with rifles, pistols and all available weapons. The police failing to restore order, the Lord Mayor appealed to the military authorities and large numbers of soldiers in armored lorries were employed in separating the combatants. With the snipers well concealed, it was difficult to rout them out and sixteen persons were killed and scores wounded before a semblance of normal conditions was established.

The fighting in Belfast served to reawaken the bitterness throughout the island and to make more difficult the continuation of the peace negotiations. Eamonn de Valera's reply on behalf of the Sinn Féin cabinet to Premier Lloyd George's latest communication was less conciliatory in tone, reiterating the demand for independence; but it expressed a willingness to send plenipotentiaries to London for further conferences.

NEW YORK BONUS LAW OVERTHROWN. The New York Court of Appeals has declared unconstitutional the state law providing for the payment of a bonus to veterans of the world war, holding that it lends the credit of the state for the benefit of individuals. Five judges concurred in the decision and two dissented. Last fall the voters approved a $45,000,000 bonus bond issue by a large majority.

BIG NAVY DIRIGIBLE BURNED. The D-6, the American navy's newest and largest non-rigid dirigible, was destroyed by fire at the Rockaway Point Air Station on Long Island, together with the hangar and three smaller balloons. The D-6 was 200 feet long and cost $100,000. The fire, attributed to the ignition of gasoline fumes by a spark, started just twenty minutes before the D-6 was to have begun a flight to Lakehurst, N. J., to the hangar built for the ZR-2.

GREEKS DEFEAT TURKS. The Greek army has broken through the extreme left of the Turkish Nationalist army after seven days of desperate fighting and has crossed the Sakaria River in its drive toward Angora, the Nationalist capital. The Turks were compelled to retreat toward the northeast, with the Greeks in close pursuit.

LEAGUE ASSEMBLY IN SESSION. The second Assembly of the League of Nations has opened in Geneva, with thirty-nine countries represented. Jonkheer H. A. van Karnebeek, Holland's Foreign Minister, was chosen president.

The Touches of God

A Sermon by REV. A. C. DIXON, D.D.*

TEXTS—Isa. 6:6-8; Ezek. 37:1; Hosea 14:5, and Mark 1:10 and 12.

STARTLING to His enemies and comforting to His friends is the fact that God is near enough to touch us at any moment; and in these Scriptures are revealed His five touches. (1) His Fire-Touch. (2) His Hand-Touch. (3) His Breath-Touch. (4) His Dew-Touch. (5) His Dove-Touch.

As a preparation for the fire-touch of God, the prophet is given a vision of the Lord "sitting upon a throne high and lifted up." The phrase "lifted up" takes us at once into the New Testament. "I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me." "As Moses lifted up the Serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of Man be lifted up." Christ on the Cross is God at His best—"high and lifted up." As we see His wisdom and power in nature, He is enthroned high above all others; but on the Cross this enthroned God is still lifted up. His throne of grace is above all His other thrones. God has wisdom and power, but He is love, and in Christ on the Cross we see Him as He is.

The live coal is taken from the altar, and this brings us again to Calvary, the great altar upon which the Lamb of God was sacrificed. The merit of His atoning death is the only fire that can consume the guilt of sin.

A vision of God on His throne, "high and lifted up" convicts the prophet of sin. "Woe is me, for I am undone, because I am a man of unclean lips and I dwell in the midst of a people of unclean lips." The index to genuine contrition is that he confesses his own sins first. Our temptation is to confess first the sins of others. While in New York, I heard many lamenting the wickedness of the city, and there was cause enough; but I heard no confession of personal sin. Beholding the sins of others may make us pharisaical in spirit. It is easy for us to feel that we are better than they. It was seeing "the king, the Lord of Hosts," which broke the prophet's heart for his own and then for the sins of his people. It is a vision of Christ on the Cross dying for our guilt which breaks our hearts for sin and turns us from it.

This fire-touch of God is a test of our sincerity. You can almost smell the odor of burning flesh, as the live coal is placed upon the prophet's lips. We are eager for the tongue of fire as at Pentecost. It is a great asset of power and insures success in our ministry. But we must secure the touch of fire if we would have the tongue of fire. God wants only clean vessels in which to carry to others the pure water of life. After the prophet had been cleansed by the fire-touch and not till then, God asked, "Whom shall I send, and who will go for us?" While polluted by sin, you need not expect God to ask you to do anything for Him. Make full confession, receive the fire-touch of God from Calvary and then you are ready for service. The prophet could say then at once, "Here am I, send me."

AFTER the fire-touch of cleansing comes the hand-touch of power. "The hand of the Lord was upon me." It was a touch from above; what our Lord Jesus called "power from on high." There is power from behind. Happy the Christian or the church that has a good prestige! There is power from before in the thrill of hope. And there is a kind of power about us, made up of good influences, educational, social and financial. But all power from behind, from before and about us, is power on the level, and itself needs the touch of "power from on high," to be truly effective.

As I stood by Niagara Falls, listening to its roar and feeling the tremor of its rushing torrent, I thought of what a Yankee once said, "I cannot enjoy these Falls because there is such a waste of power." Well, if he will go there now, he can enjoy them, for on a level with the river in the gorge below the Falls is a powerhouse with wires radiating as far as Toronto. Buffalo is lighted and heated by Niagara Falls. The trolley cars get their motor power from Niagara Falls. The Sanatorium gets the tonic touch of health for its electric baths and the electric chair its thunderbolt of death from Niagara Falls. How is it done? The question is easily answered, if you will notice that the powerhouse in the gorge is 169 feet below the top of the Falls. It gets its power from on high. If you were to lift the powerhouse up to a level with the top of the Falls, there would be a dead level of weakness. Toronto and Buffalo would get no light and heat; the trolley, no power; the sanatorium, no tonic; and the electric chair, no thunderbolt.

Does this not explain the weakness of many today? They have lifted humanity to a level with deity. There has been no little talk about "the deity of humanity." The age has become proud of human achievements, and the vision of God has been blurred, if not lost. Men have become vain in imagining that they have discovered so many kinds of power that they are no longer in need of "the power from on high." The result is a dead level of weakness in pulpit and pew.

Now, God has His Niagaras in history; the thunder and tremor of which we hear and feel through the centuries. Such were Pentecost and the Reformation. But God's greatest work, after all, is done in the quiet, the living Spirit lifting truth into character and deed, beautifying and nourishing the spiritual world. We can not make Niagaras. Let us not try. But we can by faith appropriate the living Word, that it may work in us and through us the will of God in the quiet, and, it may be, obscure places, where we live. God is often in the "still small voice," when He is not in the wind that sends the mountains and breaks the rocks.

The hand-touch of "power from on high" prepares the prophet to enter the valley of bones and bring them to life. Without this touch of God the spiritually dead cannot be made to live. Ezekiel has seen visions because God became active in answer to their prayers. Luther's motto is true: "To have prayed well is to have studied well." Melancthon's calloused knees explain the power of Luther's testimony before counts and kings.

THE book of Hosea is the backslider's manual, in which God has given us a picture of man's weakness, wickedness and worthlessness. It is a dark picture. The backslider is "desolate," "oppressed," "broken in judgment," "God-forsaken," "living on wind." He deserves not only rebuke but chastisement. Yet, God rejoices over him with the tenderness and compassion of a broken-hearted mother for her wayward child. If backsliders will return to the Lord with confession of sin, He says: "I will heal their backsliding; I will love them freely; for mine anger is turned away from him. I will be as the dew unto Israel: he shall grow as the lily and cast forth his roots as Lebanon." The dew does its work by contact, and its touch is very gentle. God will not forsake the penitent backslider, but will draw as close to Him as the dew to the plant, not for bitter reproaches and cruel strokes but for gentle graciousness. God comes into the darkness with him. He makes known to him His tender, gentle spirit of forgiveness. He pleads with him. He gives him the dew-touch of loving compassion. He suffers with him, as He rejoices with him when he has responded to the dew-touch unto repentance. "I will love him freely," and the word "freely" has in it not so much the thought of abundance as gratuitousness. God loves gratuitously. Backsliding makes us unlovely, but even unto the unlovely God is as the dew.

AT THE baptism of Jesus, the Spirit descended like a dove upon Him. "And immediately the Spirit driveth him into the wilderness." Driven by a dove, the gentlest of all touches. In every fiber of His holy nature our Lord was in revolt against contact with the foul fiend, and yet He yields to the gentle dove-touch of the Spirit and permits Himself to be driven by it to a very disagreeable experience. The slightest touch of the Spirit, intimating the Father's will, is to Him compulsion.

Let us look for one secret of His ready response in the things which took place at His baptism. He saw the heaven opened and heard the Father's voice of approval. He is in the way of perfect obedience for He said: "Thus it becometh us to fulfill all righteousness," and He is in perfect fellowship with the Father and the Spirit. When we are in the way of perfect obedience, and in perfect fellowship with God, the dove-touch of the Spirit will be our compulsion, sending us forth to the conflict with Satan.

Now, whatever else the baptism of Christ meant—and it meant more—it was the border-line between His private life and public ministry. On this border-line He saw the opened heavens and heard the Father's voice and experienced the dove-touch of the Spirit. The vision, voice, and touch were a preparation for His active ministry. And if each one of us will mark the border-line between the quiet of our homes with a season of worship in which we look up through the Word into the open heavens and listen to the Father's voice speaking in promise, prophecy and warning, we too will receive the dove-touch of the Spirit.

It is a sad fact that here in America the rush to business and school in the morning, with the confusion of late hours devoted to pleasure or duty in the evening, has led to the crumbling and downfall of the family altar in many a Christian home. The result is that the gentle dove-touch of the Spirit does not drive us, and God is often compelled to use the goad of judgment that He may keep us in the right way. Father! Mother! You cannot afford to let your children grow up in your home and go out into the world without the sacred memories of the family altar. To send the children out into the world without this dove-touch of God is to send them to defeat and shame.

That we may be vessels sanctified for the Master's use, let us receive the fire-touch of God for cleansing. That we may be endowed for service, let us receive the hand-touch of God for "power from on high." That we may be effective in raising the spiritually dead to life, let us use daily the breath-touch of God by praying as God taught Ezekiel "Come from the four winds, O Breath, and breathe upon these slain, that they may live." If we have backslidden, may we respond to God's dew-touch in the dark and return to the Lord with full confession of our sins. And may the border line between the quiet of our homes and the activities of each day be a meeting-place with God, that we may see His glory and hear His voice through His word, thus securing the dove-touch of God for all the conflicts, duties and burdens of the day.

O Master and Teacher and Friend, hold out thy hand in blessing on us as we depart, and fill our hearts with strength to do thy bidding, with power to withstand temptation, with joy in the bearing of daily burdens, and with faith in the final victory of good over evil. In Jesus' Name. AMEN.

of God (1:1) in which the human, symbolized by the hand, is moved and controlled by the Divine, symbolized by the wing. Bones cannot be quickened into life by manipulation. Only the touch of God can give them life.

IMPELLED by the breath-touch of God from above, Ezekiel said, "Thus saith the Lord God: Come from the four winds, O Breath, and breathe upon these slain that they may live." "And the breath came into them and they lived, an exceeding great army." "The breath is the life" and it was the life of God which made the dead live. At Pentecost the Spirit came, "as a rushing, mighty breath, and it filled all the house where they were sitting." The result was three thousand dead souls made alive in one day. And this took place after ten days of prayer. But we do not have to wait ten days or ten minutes for the Holy Spirit, promised by Christ, for whose advent they were waiting, is with us today, ready to work if we will trust Him, and we need Him for the one as much as for the three thousand.

This breath-touch of God came upon the spiritually dead in answer to prayer. If we pray, God works; if we fail to pray God leaves us to ourselves. Andrew Murray in his book on "Intercessory Prayer" alleges that God in dealing with His people works only in answer to prayer. If we preach without prayer, the result will be just what the sermon can do. If we give without prayer, our money will have to work alone; and it may be useful. But if we pray, as we preach and give, we shall receive what God can do through sermon and money. The greatest need of the Church is not more preaching, or money, but more God. "When they had prayed, the place was shaken,"

The Strait Gate

SUNDAY. Matt. 7:14. "Strait is the gate, and narrow the way, which leadeth unto life." This is true of anything and everything which is truly vital and worthy. We enter its domain by a strait gate. Every lofty thing is reached by a narrow way. There is no broad highway to the heights. The only way is the narrow approach.

How is it with the life of the body? How do we reach the bracing realm of physical health? We reach it by the strait gate and the narrow way. The gourmand does not breathe its light and buoyant air. He takes a broad way which does not lead in its direction. It is imperative that I be something of an ascetic if I would enjoy the fine flavors of the feast. The glutton goes down the broad way and misses them. Even in eating there must be a certain restriction, if we would discover its delights. We must take the narrow way. The athlete must be "temperate in all things."

It is even so in higher realms of mastery and attainment. How does the scholar reach a vital mastery in his domain? How does he acquire mental power and efficiency? How does he come into possession of the treasures of gathered knowledge and wisdom? How does he enter that fine, wide-spreading country with its magnificent visions and panoramas? He enters it by the strait gate and the narrow way. The broad way winds about in the infertile land of shallowness and ignorance. The broad way has no limitations, but it has no discoveries. It boasts of its liberty, but it has no splendid "finds." Even in this realm there must be restriction, if we would reach the treasury, and enrich ourselves with its spoils. The scholar must "scorn delights and live laborious days." He must go by the strait gate and the narrow way.

And so it is with the esthetic realm of art, and music, and literature. What is the condition of entrance? The strait gate and the narrow way. If I would have liberty in these wonderful countries, I must first of all accept the necessary bonds. I recently took up sketching. I thought how recuperating it would be, how rejuvenating to have communion with the strength and loveliness of nature! Yes, I would go forth and sketch nature! "No, you won't!" said my art master; "you will begin by drawing straight lines of varied lengths and thickness! After a while you shall try a curve!" But what about the landscape? "Oh, we will get to the landscape some day! We shall get there through straight lines and winding curves." And so I began my journey to the lovely expressions of mountains, and woodlands, and seas, by the fearful limitations of pot-hooks and straight lines. It certainly is a very narrow and circumscribed way. But I am confidently told it leads to the heights. And as it is with art so it is with music. There are restrictions all along the road.

And when I inquire about still higher realms, I am directed to the narrow way. What about the moral domain? What about its franchise, its rights, its freedom? And for answer I am told there is no possible freedom without law. Without law freedom is only a wild vagrancy, and there is a whole world of a difference between liberty and license. It is very strange, and yet it is equally true that the absolutely "loose" life is in the most terrible of bonds. When we describe any one as living a "loose life," we are suggesting something which is the very opposite to freedom. A "loose life" is weighted with chains; there are bonds on every limb. That sort of broad way does not lead to freedom's heights. On the other hand there is a royal bondage which is the friend and companion of liberty. The restriction is the ally and servant of power. We take the narrow way and we reach our inheritance—"the glorious liberty of the children of God." In many a letter of Paul he describes himself as a bondsman, the bondsman of Christ, and yet in every one of his letters he glories in his marvelous freedom. It is the secret of mastery; it is the path to power. "If ye continue in my word"—that is the narrow way—"ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free." That great sentence is like a climbing road which begins in a strait gate, and continues in a narrow way, but which leads to glorious uplands where life exults in perfect freedom. "If the Son shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed." J. H. J.

Studying Jesus

MONDAY. Matt. 11:29. "Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me." Why do we insist upon turning to every one and every thing to learn rather than to the Master? We look into our own wisdom and our own imaginations and try to picture God, and then complain that the result is unsatisfactory. God and life both alike must remain meaningless until we have learned their meaning from Christ. We need, above all things else, to come and learn of Him.

A minister was in his study one day deeply engrossed in his work. His three-year-old child was enjoying the rather unusual privilege of sharing the study with her father. Across the table from him she sat and watched his every movement. The silence was broken by the voice of the child: "Daddy, are you studyin'?"

"Yes, dear, I am studying," the father replied.

"I am studyin', too," the response came.

"Daddy, are you studyin' Jesus?"

When the reply was given in the affirmative, the baby said: "I am studyin' Jesus, too."

The man remembered that the Lord had quoted the words of the Psalmist, "Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings, thou hast perfected praise." He knew that if he were not studying Jesus, he had better follow the suggestion of the little child and study Jesus. Only thus could he maintain his right to be a Christian minister and an interpreter of the God revealed in Jesus Christ.

It is the thing we all need to learn. Only by studying Jesus can the hungry heart and the yearning soul be satisfied. It is the only thing that can suffice. The inference of Peter's question, put to the Christ when the Master asked if he, too, would go away, we know to be very truth, "Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou alone hast the words of eternal life." There is none other to whom we can go. Our great lessons must be learned at the feet of Jesus. We must take His yoke upon us and learn of Him. J. A. M.

Followers of the Gleam

TUESDAY. John 12:26. "If any man serve me, let him follow me . . . if any man serve me, him will my Father honor." Studying the history of the splendid achievements of wilderness schools and colleges, and jungle churches and hospitals, and waste-place transformations and regenerations, the evidence comes to us that God reigns. The spirit of the Christ is as much abroad today as in the days of His flesh, when He dwelt and walked and talked with men as the incarnate God. The Holy Spirit is as potent in this hour as it was in the hour of Pentecost. We likewise know that prayer does change things and earnest petition, plus holy endeavor, ushers in the Kingdom. In the face of what has been done at home and in the foreign field, there is no reason why anybody should become cynical or discouraged. The day of the miracle is not past. We can not help but be strong in our belief, when we think of the innumerable "followers of the gleam" on the fringes of civilization and the frontiers of the world, how they have turned one-third of the globe to God, whose face is never away from the needs and woes of humanity. And we can not help but believe, for the sake of the other two-thirds that are insistent for the Gospel. They are opening the closed windows of the centuries toward the light that shines from Bethlehem's morning star.

The followers of the gleam, pastors and people, Christian men and women everywhere, are ushering in the dawn of a better day. Every follower of Jesus is the herald of a new epoch. The human race is moving upward, Godward, Christward, kingdomward. God, according to promise, is honoring those who are serving Him. R. B.

Making the Most of Your Life

WEDNESDAY. James 4:14. "For what is your life? It is even a vapor that appeareth for a little time, then vanisheth away." Life in its brevity is like the incident of the travelers who meet by night crossing the desert, look into each others' faces, exchange a few words of greeting and then go on their way. Our Lord had only three years in His active ministry. He left no writings, but commissioned loving disciples to repeat His words to others. How many feel the bitterness of the brevity of the years, when apparently we are just prepared for the work of life. Our life is like a weaver's shuttle, or a bird flying through the air, or a ship sailing through the sea, leaving no trace on the wave.

When Moses was ready to enjoy the fruits of his labor, he is permitted to take only one look at the promised land of his hopes. David accumulates the material for the temple, while Solomon becomes the builder. John Wesley's life of nearly ninety years seemed brief, but he left words of truth taking root in millions of hearts.

What seems death is only larger life, promotion to grander opportunities. What appears to be night is only the momentary sleep before the eternal morning. To die is gain in soul wealth. In one day we may do the work that will last a thousand years. Some heroes have accomplished in an hour results that have shaken the world, in science, discovery, and religion.

Some see only the mirage in the desert of their life—a stagnation, a mockery of manhood. Others so number their days that they apply their hearts unto wisdom. Their years are only moments out of the eternal now, but pregnant with power for future glory.

God's Book of Life records every act of the past; we may redeem the evil which is past by the power of Christ who will wash out all stains, making the pages of life shine with the beauty of His holiness.

E. W. C.

The Will to Be Saved

THURSDAY. Luke 15:18. "I will arise and go." The love of God is immeasurable; but were it a thousand times as infinite as it is, it could not save the sinner against his will. The hand of Christ that was pierced for our deliverance is extended in vain unless the sinner grasps it. The door of the Father's house is open; but the prodigal must arise and go.

And when he resolves to return to the Father's house, it is obvious that he must return by the way that leads to it. "I am the way," said Jesus; "no man cometh unto the Father but by me." Absolutely there is no other way. "I am the door," said Jesus; but so far as the salvation of the sinner is concerned the door might just as well have remained shut unless he wills to enter it. D. J. B.

Starting Home

FRIDAY. Luke 15:18. "And go to my father." There is nothing finer in the New Testament than the parable of the Prodigal Son. Somebody has called it "The Parable of the Beautiful Father." There is nothing in any religion which more satisfactorily represents the relation of God to man and of man to God. Indeed the two questions which test the value of any religion are: What does it teach about God? What does it teach about man?

This parable meets both tests. It says that God is a father ready to receive and forgive His children. It says that man is fallen, yet free; fallen, yet yearning to go back home to God.

So the parable is really a picture. As a good lens will project upon the ground glass of a camera the magic of a whole landscape, mountain, valley, river, forest, sky, so this parable reveals to us the purpose of God, the drama of redemption and the destiny of the human soul. The father saw the prodigal while he was yet afar off. He has been looking for him. It means that God is looking for us. The prodigal is completely disillusioned. His egotism is gone; now there is hope for him. His dreams are gone; they were what misled him. In a strange land, ragged and remorseful, he vows a vow to start home.

These words represent any one of us in the utterance of a religious resolution. No one of us ever began to live the eternal life who did not first summon himself to the task. The first active co-operation in our own salvation is the mobilization of our moral forces at the behest of purpose. It is the divine in us which cries out to the divine above us. God draws us toward Him, and as we yield, we ascend. We put our feet on things which have hindered us; we scale the heights which have frowned upon us; we reach the summit which mocked us as unattainable. The stars are still beyond us, but we shall yet attain. C. C. A.

The Folly of Procrastination

SATURDAY. Ex. 8:10. "And he said, Tomorrow." II Cor. 6:2. "Now is the day of salvation." A recent writer has introduced the theme of "putting off" into a children's story, entitled: "Wait-a-Minute Willie." Pharaoh said "Tomorrow." Paul said "Today." The difference is that between a man who knew the value of time and a man who did not. Today is the only day of which we are sure; tomorrow may never dawn. Today is real; tomorrow is vision.

Tomorrow is the slogan of the idler, slacker, and indolent. Today is the rallying cry of the doer, toiler and crusader. If the future is going to be great, it will only be so because of the efforts in our present. It is the things to which we give impetus now that shall spell success then. Today we set in motion those processes that culminate in the achievement of tomorrow.

Character is an evolution. No one ever drifted toward the throne of God. Perfection is reached through Gethsemane. The cross precedes the crown. Calvary comes before resurrection. If we would reign with Jesus we must suffer with Jesus. Today we must fill our lamps and trim our wicks. Tomorrow we enter into privilege. Our tomorrows are built on our today's and our today's are built on our yesterday's.

"Today if ye will hear his voice, harden not your heart." "Choose ye this day whom ye will serve." The harvest is ready. The reapers are needed immediately. This applies in the realm of the religious as well as the secular, to kingdoms spiritual as well as material. R. B.

Apperson's Fourteen Points of Superiority

1. RIDING COMFORT—Because of proper distribution of weight and carefully selected springs, driving comfort is provided not only at ten miles but also at fifty miles per hour. You actually rest as you ride.
2. TURNING RADIUS—You can turn an Apperson with its 130-inch wheelbase around in  $38\frac{1}{4}$  feet. This means you can get in and out from curbs easily and can turn nicely in the average city street.
3. PICKUP—In the traffic of the cities you need acceleration. The Apperson glides from 1 to 40 miles in 20 seconds.
4. SAFETY—Deceleration also is much needed both on the city boulevard and country road alike. The Apperson comes to a standstill from 40 miles in 40 yards—in 4 seconds.
5. HIGH SPEED—You can travel as fast as road conditions will permit in an Apperson—and the car rides easily and smoothly without sideway or vibration.
6. SLOW SPEED—You can drive an Apperson at walking pace—in high. This helps in traffic and it does the work quietly and smoothly.
7. EASE OF CONTROL—Drive an Apperson slowly in crowded traffic or send it over the road at high speed—and see how easily it steers. There is no arm fatigue on the longest jaunts. It is responsive to the wheel.

At the Sign of the Golden Calf

as Mr. Barrows calls it. He fairly loathes it, but conforms to the convention—like the sensible man he is. Some clergymen won't. That gown is a love! And you will look lovely in it."

MRS. BARROWS, a buxom woman, somewhat above the medium height, was so pleasing in expression that she might be called handsome. She was nearer sixty than fifty, but looked ten years younger in animated conversation. Mrs. Haile decided in watching her turn the Japanese fabric in the sunshine that she had most of the elements of popularity with the average parishioners. Mrs. Barrows gave the gown an affectionate stroke in laying it back upon the lounge, talking all the time: "... And Mr. Haile will be the handsomest man there in his dress-coat. I was sure he had one"—as the other nodded assent. "Between ourselves, I don't fancy any dress that proclaims the wearer's profession from the house-top, as one might say."

"For myself I own to a liking for the clerical dress," ventured Mrs. Haile gently. "My brother-in-law, Rev. Dr. May of Poughkeepsie, is in the Reformed Dutch Church. I think his gown adds dignity to him in the pulpit. I wish I could make you know, Mrs. Barrows, what a kindness you have done to me in asking us to come to you for the recep—demonstration!" she corrected herself with a little laugh. "As you may have heard, Mr. and Mrs. Ford invited us to stay with them for the Installation and the following Sunday. I was kept at home by two days of such sick headache as I had never had before. For a while the doctor feared I was in for a serious illness. Yes"—responsive to the other's look of inquiry—"I am quite well again and it may be that the enforced rest was a benefit to me. I am usually very healthy. The strain of the change—and all that—broke me down, I suppose."

"See that you don't repeat the experiment of trying to see how much a woman can endure and yet live—and smile!" Mrs. Barrows warned. "Your non-appearance was the only balk in Mr. Ford's program. What a man of might he is, when he puts his hand to the plough! He has both hands upon the handles of the machine. We all are looking forward with intense curiosity to the Unique Demonstration. That is what everybody has learned from him to call it. The newspapers will be sure to catch up the title in reporting it."

Anita shrank and shuddered.

"Don't think me ungrateful, please, but I wish I could get away from the clank of machinery in all this!"

A LARGE, gloved hand stroked the bowed shoulders soothingly.

"There! my child! bear up and look at the bright side. I've been through it all twice. You can't give me points upon the subject of pastoral changes. We may as well adjust our ideas and our sensibilities to the tremendous fact that this is an age of machinery and that the Church must fall into line with it, or be left out in the cold. I may remark in this connection that the Banner Church has the reputation of being run according to the most admirable of business principles. Unless I am mistaken, there are six separate and distinct Societies, Associations, et cetera, run by women of that parish. Don't start at the idea! There are two Mission Auxiliaries—Foreign and Domestic—and the Charitable Sewing Band and the Helping Hand, and the Cheerful Workers—children under twelve. There is another, I am certain, but I can't recall the name. And such perfect organization! The charitable branches are under a salaried superintendent who controls the finances and appoints visitors and the like. The mission societies have each its own officer, and it is the same with the rest of the bunch. It is a rich church and contributes liberally to the Great Boards. You are familiar with the jargon, of course."

"I am afraid not." It was said so gravely that the large hand went up to the flushing face as one might quiet a terrified child. "I am afraid I have a great deal to learn in the new school to which we are going. And—excuse me! but what you tell me seems to put the pastor so far away from the flock that the words lose their meaning—and their sweetness. There are nearly four hundred members in our—I would say in the Marlinton church. And my husband knows them all by name and sight. Our Ladies' Aid Association looks after the poor and the sick, and those who are in trouble which the pastor might relieve—and so forth," beginning to stammer and reddening more deeply. "In fact, Mrs. Barrows, we are like one big family, as far as the interests of all are involved. It has been a blessed work for us all."

"There! there, dear girl!" reiterated the visitor, as the quavering accents sank into silence and Anita's handkerchief sought her streaming eyes. "It has been a splendid work. That is one reason why your husband is called to go up higher, and into a bigger field. He'll acquit himself well there, too. And so will his wife. A year from this time, I shall be congratulating you and the Banner Church."

CHAPTER VII

"THIS is probably the last letter I shall write to you from the 'thatched-roofed cot,'" wrote Mrs. Haile to her sister in Poughkeepsie, a week after Mrs. Barrows's visit. "We may be said to occupy it upon sufferance, for the pulpit has been supplied by students from the Theological Seminary for two Sundays, Stuart having to preach in New York. It seems already a year since I prattled that sweet nonsense about the 'thatched cot.' We leave it in another ten days. The Lawsons have opened their big house—built upon the same scale as their hearts—for our refuge until these transition calamities be overpast. Dr. Stenson's family have vacated the city personage, and it is undergoing such changes as are needful to prepare it for the new tenants. He has removed from New York to Montclair, N. J., where his married daughter is living. They say that he has a house of his own there, and that he will be entirely comfortable for the rest of his days."

"For ourselves, we have had no public farewell reception. It was our earnest desire that there should be none. It would only tear open the wounds we are trying to heal. But the dear people have been unremitting in testimonials of affection, in speech and in action. Stuart received 'with the love and lasting esteem of the church' a certificate of deposit in his name in the Savings Bank of One Thousand Dollars, accompanied by a note to the effect that he might find it useful in defraying our boy's college expenses if it were not needed before that time. From the women of our church I had, through the Ladies' Aid, a purse containing two hundred and fifty dollars in gold. I think though that I value yet more the scores of lesser gifts, most of them the work of the donors' fingers."

"There is to be a very handsome tribute to Dr. Stenson, the exact nature of which is kept as a pleasant surprise to all except the Committee that have the Unique Demonstration in charge. You know me well enough to comprehend what lies under the froth of this epistle. But for my incorrigible sense of the ridiculous and grotesque in what would otherwise break my heart, I should not be alive enough to sign myself,

"Lovingly and sadly yours,

"ANITA HAILE."

THE Bannerites, as irreverent street-urchins persisted in styling the parishioners of the large and fashionable church to which we must now remove the scene of action—prided themselves, and with reason, upon the superiority of their church-parlors—always spoken of in the plural—to those of any other organization in the metropolis. They had been newly "decorated" with paint and gilding, in season to allow the glaring effects of both to mellow before the evening of the Unique Demonstration. They filled rapidly after the wide doors were thrown open.

HEART STORIES

A NEW BOOK OF SEVEN STORIES

By Dr. Charles M. Sheldon
author of "IN HIS STEPS"

Dr. Sandison says:

"Dr. Sheldon's new book, entitled, 'Heart Stories,' shows his wonderful versatility in depicting the spiritual life in its most interesting phases. In these seven stories, the reader will find some of the most interesting themes.

We form the acquaintance of such characters as Andrew Stoddard, in the 'Good Fight,' who became a benefactor to his fellowmen after his own career had apparently been wrecked by an accident; Robert Arnold in 'As Heaven Views It,' whose routine, selfish nature was illumined by a vision in which he listened to the Recording Angel's record of one day of his own life; the sudden change of mind that caused the Pastor of the Church of Milton to withdraw his letter of resignation, and how it all came about is delightfully told in 'Why the Minister Remained'; the story of Rosy Calvaire, the little factory box-maker, is stirringly told in 'Of Such Is the Kingdom' and is a terrible arraignment of child labor; 'Sunrise on the Mesa' is a story of the Arizona desert and the Navajo and Hopi Indians; 'His Christmas Gift' is a Christmas story of New York life and experience, and what happened at the most remarkable Christmas dinner Sidney Allen had ever attended; the whole concluding with a coal mine story entitled 'Guests of Honor,' in which a winter storm brought unexpected guests to the mine manager's family circle, who treated them as guests of honor—but the stories the reader must read for himself. The whole, delightfully and romantically told, is well adapted to reading in the family group when its members meet by the cozy fire on winter evenings. All admirers of Dr. Sheldon's world-famous book, 'In His Steps,' should read this new book.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD
Book Department
BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK

The Rev. Dr. and Mrs. Stenson were among the earlier arrivals and were at once inducted into a couple of handsome armchairs set upon a low dais at the head of the inner parlor where they could be seen of all who entered. The retired pastor was slim and white-haired, of medium stature and slightly bowed at shoulders. He looked every day of his three-score years, as he stepped forward to salute the new incumbents, a fatherly smile lighting the pale eyes. Silence that could be and was felt by the least sensitive observer of the scene reached the uttermost corners of the great rooms.

As the four turned to face the crowd after the exchange of greetings, a more striking contrast could hardly have been imagined than they presented. The older man, almost weakened by the well-fitting dress-coat that left no angle unseen, seemed actually to shrink and shrivel beside the hale, handsome six-footer towering above so far that he bent his head instinctively in addressing him. Nor was the unflattering effect upon the beholders lessened by a glance that took in the respective consorts of the two. Mrs. Stenson was as tall as her husband, angular in outline, sharp-featured and what might be characterized as "professionally benign." The scantiness of her gray hair was partially masked by a head-dress of black and white lace, and she wore fine laces at throat and wrists.

She had evidently done the best that time and labors had allowed her to offer to the critical spectators. The trust of her friends—and she numbered them by the hundred—could not have denied that she might have been the grandmother of the lissome figure whose white draperies, floating about her, to fall into a train that lent her height and grace, would have made her girlish but for the gentle dignity with which she bore her part in the brief colloquy succeeding the introduction to her predecessors in office.

"AIN'T she a stunner?" chuckled a boy at Mrs. Barrows's back.

And "Hush! hush!" from a woman's voice drew Mrs. Barrows's face around to meet the eyes of an imposing matron of perhaps five and forty, superb in black lace and diamonds.

"Good evening, Mrs. Wingate!" on one side and "Ah, is it you, Mrs. Barrows?" upon the other betrayed mutual acquaintanceship.

"I am afraid you overheard my saucy nephew," the younger of the twain said with an apologetic laugh. "I confess to some degree of sympathy in his admiration of our new pastor's wife. She is, to say the least, more than passably pretty, and more distinguished than we had dared to expect from the semi-rural districts."

"I would not have believed I could have come so near to hating any mortal woman as I came at that minute!" Mrs. Barrows told her husband that night. "I foresee mischief for our dear little girl should the Leading Lady take it into her head to be jealous of her. I bit the tip of my tongue so sharply that it was sore for the rest of the evening, before I could reply decently."

The decent reply was that she had the pleasure of knowing Mrs. Haile very well. In fact she was now her guest.

"And Marlinton is not even semi-rural, but a wide-awake town with strong probabilities of healthy and vigorous growth. The Banner Church was not likely to choose a pastor from an uncultured parish. I am glad of the opportunity to congratulate you upon the selection of both husband and wife."

"Thank you! Perhaps you would be so kind as to present your friend to me? That she is your friend makes me the more desirous to know her."

"Certainly I will." Mrs. Barrows was proof against flattery implied or downright.

MRS. LAWSON had told her pastor's wife that Silas Ford "exuded prosperity when he was at his most redundant best." Mrs. Haile recalled the bon mot as he took his stand upon the dais at the right of the Stensons, facing the entrance, his manuscript in hand.

"Fellow-members and guests of the Banner Church!" he began, biting the syllables apart, and rolling each like unctuous morsels under his tongue. "We have come together tonight upon what I do not hesitate to say is one of the most agreeable occasions of my life and the life of our beloved church. As you who have ever contributed so generously to the high and holy cause of Foreign Missions know, we have lately completed a Mission House in Korea. The last payment of ten thousand dollars was made a month ago. The plans for the edifice were submitted to you a year ago. I have brought with me tonight a fine photograph of the House as it may be seen by admiring multitudes of pagans today. You can have the opportunity of seeing the picture when the present business is through."

"For I have the honor and happiness of announcing to you what the Committee in charge of this Unique Demonstration of love and loyalty and heartfelt appreciation of a great and a good man, have thought it wise to keep secret from the Church at large and especially from the man we delight to honor. The beautiful and commodious edifice, embodying chapel, school-rooms, library and dormitory for students, has been solemnly dedicated to the Author and Finisher of our Faith under the name and style of 'The Samuel Stenson Mission Home.' It stands and will stand for ages to come as a monument to the true shepherd who has led us beside still waters and among green pastures for a quarter of a century, and who now retires to the shades of private life, full of years and honors, to see the labor of his hands in this and in foreign lands. Generations of converted heathen yet unborn shall arise and call his name blessed."

"I could dwell at length upon his zeal for Foreign Missions, but time will not allow me to linger upon the theme. I thank you for listening so patiently to my prolix remarks and will now grant you the opportunity to congratulate our venerable and venerated ex-pastor upon the monument commemorating his worthy deeds."

He concluded with a low bow to the subject of the eulogy, and stepped aside to make room for the next speaker.

WHILE the room rang with resounding palms and exclamations, Dr. Stenson made an effort to rise, fell back in his chair and covered his face with his hands.

"Stenson! Stenson! speech!" bawled a big man half-way down the hall, who was apparently more used to political than ecclesiastical assemblies.

A protesting "hush" subdued him and the applause. For the bent figure did not stir from his chair and Stuart Haile was kneeling beside him holding a glass of water to his mouth. He bent his ear to catch what the white lips and the agonized eyes strove to convey to him. He passed the glass to a bystander and walked calmly to the front of the platform. "Thank them for me! please!" was all he had made out, but he interpreted the rest.

"Dear friends!" began the marvelous voice, clear as a bugle call, round and resonant, yet losing nothing of the sympathetic quality that Silas Ford averred had hypnotized him on the memorable night of the telephone sermon. "Dr. Stenson has asked me to express to you what an overwhelming sense of your great kindness has deprived him of the ability to say. The tribute your gift has added to the many evidences of your devotion and reverence for him might well hold him speechless. His emotion is the most precious return that could be made for what you have done. He feels all this and so much more that I can not attempt to voice it. You will all comprehend this, I am sure."

There was no effort to produce a rhetorical effect, but the solemn hush that fell upon the crowd proved his mastery over imagination and heart. Women wept freely and silently, and men wiped streaming eyes as the old man dragged himself to his feet and shambled forward. He held out a hand to his representative and wrung Haile's with a smile more pathetic than tears could have been; then, with something of the old-time grace that had distinguished him in the pulpit in his palmy days, kissed the tips of his fingers to the throng of spectators smilingly, and took the arm Ford offered to lead him across the platform to the vestry-door.

A thunder of applause followed him, and the audience resumed its seats to await the second part of the "Demonstration."

DR. BARROWS was upon his feet by the time all were seated.

"I am your grateful debtor," he began brusquely, "inasmuch as you have selected me from so many who could have performed far better the honorable task of saying a few of the countless good things I could tell you of the man whom you have called to be your pastor."

"I have known Stuart Haile as boy and man. His father was my father's friend and this man comes of godly ancestry upon both sides of the house. He was brought up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord, and in the flush of vigorous manhood he has not departed from the old-fashioned faith. He would go to the stake for it. I'll warrant that. It was a way some of his forefathers had. He will preach sound doctrine, yet—and this, too, I guarantee—he will never be dull."

"But I feel constrained by conscience to admit to you that he has been criticized for talking too plainly in the pulpit when dealing with sin. Let me give you a homely illustration. Two of your own members heard Haile last summer preach upon the duty of forgiving one's enemies—and for that matter anybody that has trespassed against you, if you would hope for forgiveness of your own trespasses. He called the clause of the Lord's Prayer upon which he based the admonition, 'The Emphasized Petition.' Said one of your members in talking over the sermon afterward: 'That is mighty close preaching. I doubt if some people would stand it.'"

"'Ye are mistaken there, my mon!' says the other. I needn't mention to what nation he once belonged and that the nation is famous for good preachers and orthodoxy. 'Almost everybody likes close preaching, when it's the other mon that's hit. And the other mon's pretty sure to be in the next pew!'"

He had to wait a full minute before the outburst of laughter subsided. Thomas MacArthur, who was one of the ushers, backed away into the open door of the vestry through which, as all knew, Dr. and Mrs. Stenson were listening to the harangue.

The orator was grave enough when he could be heard again.

"Never mind how I heard that anecdote. There is deep spiritual significance in it. We find other people's sins and shortcomings more interesting subjects of conversation than our own. As I have said, the man you have selected to lead you into the Way Everlasting will not be backward in declaring the whole counsel of God, whether men will bear or whether they will forbear. I am glad you have him and glad he has you. May the Great Shepherd bless you and give him many souls as the reward of his ministry among you!"

"ALL the same," said Dr. Barrows as the carriage containing the four was rolling through the almost deserted streets on the way home. "All the same—" deliberately and reflectively—"I could not help thinking that perhaps a second ten-thousand-dollar cheque bearing Stenson's name and payable to his order might have been as honorable tribute to him and as pleasing to the Lord as the dear man's name on the doorplate of the Mission House."

"These things ye ought to have done and not to have left the others undone!" quoted his wife. "That is a very rich church. To make out the additional cheque would have meant no more to the men who wrote the first than a fifty-cent piece would to me if I dropped it into the collection-plate on Foreign Mission Sunday. And I chance to know that the Stensons have very scanty private means. They have lived upon their salary, and with their five children have saved very little."

"I incline to think well of Silas Ford's theory," Dr. Barrows said, "that the Church should imitate the Army in retiring veterans upon half-pay at a given age. Please note that I say 'theory,' Haile. It will not be put into practice in my time, nor in yours, my boy!"

vestigations for a year, the Waterfall Committee put its projects before the Althing in the summer of 1919. Out of this procedure rose a great controversy over the right of ownership in waterfalls. A hot debate in the Althing ended in the ratification of a proposal to summon the government to declare all water-power in uninhabited common land a property of the state, and to make arrangements for the cancellation of any contracts which individuals might have made with corporations, if such contracts interfered with the right of the public.

ONE project in which the development of Iceland's water-power will be very useful is the introduction of railroads. At present there is not a railway on the island. Trains run by steam would hardly pay their cost, unless the price of coal became greatly reduced, which is scarcely likely, considering the continuous upward trend of prices almost everywhere. It is therefore planned to introduce trains run by electricity, which in turn is to be generated by the waterfalls.

The existence in this age of a highly civilized nation without a single railway seems almost an impossibility. But while the island itself includes more than 40,000 square miles, only its outskirts are really habitable. Most of the people live near the shore, although there are inhabited districts lying as much as a hundred miles from it. Traveling up and down the coast is now done on coast-boats, and in the last few years the use of automobiles and motor trucks has become quite general.

But up until the last ten years, ponies were the only means of travel in the interior. All went by means of the Icelandic ponies, which are both spirited and sagacious. Their small hoofs are fitted for the rough trails; and if food is scant, they are contented with little.

In winter, when the rivers are frozen, they are used as highways for sledges, drawn by these same small ponies.

Goods too heavy for a pony are often stored until they can be carried into the country by means of these river sledges.

BUT the chief wealth of the island is in its agriculture and its fishing. Sheep-raising is very profitable, one farmer sometimes keeping as many as several thousand at a time.

The waters around the island are often called the "gold mines of Iceland." From these waters every year, millions of dollars are taken in the form of cod, herring and halibut. For nine months of the year the bold fishermen face the dangers always connected with the seaman's life. Every year the sea claims its sacrifice of men and boats. Nevertheless they do not dread, but enjoy the toil and rough life on the fishing boats.

Around the island, making possible its animal and vegetable life, flows the Gulf Stream. Were it not for the warmth which it contributes, Iceland would be surrounded by polar-ice, impossible of habitation, and much more deserving of its name than it is at present.

Far from wars and rumors of wars, with few capitalists and as few poor people, the little nation of Iceland continues its thrifty, industrious life in sturdy independence. Illiteracy is unknown among its people. The intelligent children on the island are hardly able to walk before they are well informed about the whole constitution of their forefathers' famous republic, the first ever established in Europe. And in spite of their anxiety to prevent their nationality and language from being infected by foreign elements, the Icelanders build no "Chinese wall" around themselves or their country. Visitors from abroad are frequent there, and Icelanders themselves go to other countries for study and for pleasure. They wish to know what other nations are doing, but they are determined to remain true to their own traditions and ideals. And this, after all, is only reasonable; for never will all nations be cut out by the same pattern.

Why My Family Takes Internal Baths

When I was a boy, I was full of health, strength, vigor and ambition. Strenuous play and activity kept me in good shape most of the time, but once in a while, in spite of my exercise, my stomach or liver got out of kilter and then Mother stepped in and dosed me back to normal.

You see, the combination of continuous activity and simple remedies were all that was needed.

But, when I arrived at manhood and entered business, there was a different story to tell.

Instead of getting sick quickly and over it the same way, I would be way below par for some time before I knew what was the matter with me.

And when the liver did assert itself and I was really incapacitated, I found that the old favorite remedies did not work as well as of old.

They would be partially successful for the moment, but headaches, constipation and biliousness with all their attendant ills became more and more frequent—

Until one day, praise be, I heard of the Internal Bath, tried it, and have been entirely free from those universal ills ever since.

On discussing this with a Physician friend, he told me that accumulated waste in the Large Intestine is by far the greatest foe to good health, fully ninety per cent of all illnesses being attributable to that cause—

That it is impossible for the vast majority of people to eliminate this naturally because of our present mode of living—

And the reason that a scientifically correct Internal Bath, used with proper regularity, is by far the best means of elimination, is because it thoroughly cleanses the Lower Intestine its entire length and keeps it as sweet and free from poisons as nature demands it to be for perfect health.

After I proved what it would do for me, I decided that my family would have a remedy in childhood that would be just as resultful in old age.

That's the reason my wife and children take Internal Baths and none of the children dread the ordeal as I did medicine when I was a boy, either.

The common-sense of this treatment is particularly interesting and all its details are contained in a little book called "The What, The Why, The Way of Internal Bathing," written by Chas. A. Tyrrell, M.D., who, I am informed, made this method his life study and practice.

Tyrrell's Hygienic Institute, 134 West 65th St., New York City, make it a practise to send this book, entirely free of cost, to any interested person who will mention having read this in Christian Herald.

Personally, I am so enthusiastic on the subject, that I think it a duty everyone owes himself, or herself, to at least be informed on this subject, especially when it costs nothing to do so.—(Advertisement.)

Missionary Results in South America

C. E. Psa. 2:1-8

"ASK of me and I shall give thee the heathen for thine inheritance and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession." In other words, pray for South America. There is not room enough within the brief space allotted to these topic discussions to tell one-third, in the shortest sentences, concerning the need of South America. Land of great cathedrals, magnificent architecture, luxurious homes, large cities with broad avenues, many millionaires, unlimited resources in forests, waterways, mines and agricultural possibilities due to richness of soil and elements of climate.

That is one side of the picture. The other side is godlessness and squalor and misery unspeakable among the Indians for whom the Protestant churches are striving to the utmost. The Indian is exploited and buffeted about, his rights disregarded, and he lives the life of an animal. Get a book on South America for fascinating reading and genuine thrills of adventure. The combined forces of Protestantism are working heroically among the 12,000,000 Indians with schools, religious and secular, but in the face of overwhelming odds, for the people are gripped by superstition and the forces of law refuse to defend the subjects of injustice and exploitation. It is pioneer work, but work that is being done and work that challenges the red blood of any Christian man or woman once the tragic facts are known concerning this race that has a status nothing less than slavery. Send to your denominational publishing house for details of the work. It will well repay you to study the conditions.

E. L. Mission Study Topics.

IT IS called the "Blue Folder" and contains in brief the Central Office plans for the fall and winter courses of study, restates the "Church-Wide Plan" and the "Spelling-School Plan" of carrying on the study. Other suggestions for the promotion of Stewardship and Tithing are given. The year from midsummer 1922 to midsummer 1923 is the year when mission study gets the emphasis in all departments and its promotion is supposed to be helped by everybody. Use this evening of September 25 for the discussion and formation of mission study classes, choice of text-book, material that will help and the leadership necessary.

Americans All

B. Y. P. U. Mark 6:34; Matt. 25:31-46; Gal. 3:23. Conquest Meeting.

THE best material for the preparation of this topic is found in "Old Trails and New" by Coe Hayne. Current events may be gleaned from the daily papers, missionary magazines, denominational papers and from personal observation. The topic is an easy one to discuss, for we are living in tense days of patriotism and loyalty. This may be made a patriotic meeting and all the members may give a brief talk on the theme "Why I Am Glad to Be an American." Or the meeting may be given over to the discussion of the immigration problem, members giving brief suggestions as to how best to Americanize those who come from foreign shores. Or some particular field in which Baptists are working may be surveyed, for instance, Indians, Mormons, Mexicans or Italians. Plan the work. Work the plan.

AT ANACONDA, Mont., is a smelter which has a chimney 585 feet high and with an inside diameter at the top of sixty feet. The purpose in building so high is to reclaim valuable minerals which otherwise would pass out with the smoke and be lost.

Reviewing Paul's Ministry

International Sunday-School Lesson for September 25

Devotional Reading. Gal. 6: 1-10

By REV. SAMUEL D. PRICE, D.D.

"THE whole is greater than its part" is an axiom in geometry. Careful study of each part is essential, and this we have been doing for the past twelve weeks. It is also valuable to observe the interrelated whole. Review Sunday is always worth while, but especially so when we have such a closely related series of lessons, as during the present quarter. From preparatory years to an established life-work Paul has been followed. He was about fifty-five years old when he preached in Athens and he wrought for at least fifteen years more before he entered upon his eternal reward. At this age his public ministry is less than half over and the more important work was still in the future. He had not written even the first of the thirteen letters which now form part of the canon of Scripture. At fifty-five he had learned how to work for the Master, and he kept active until his death came somewhere near 68 A.D., as a conclusion to the second imprisonment at Rome.

Teachers, pupils, home department members and individual students or readers are urged to study this lesson with unusual care, that the work of the quarter may be seen in its grand scope and fixed in the memory for continuous use. This lesson study is written while on a lecture trip to Schroon Lake and Silver Bay, Lake George, and an apt illustration is at hand. In the swift 30-foot launch of a friend, the shore of Schroon Lake was seen and the detail was thoroughly enjoyed. The more lasting impressions were made, however, as the broad view was studied from the porch of that delightful home, "Almanole." Today we have the view that enables us, as it were, to take in the extent of the shore-line with lofty mountain ranges behind the high peaks that are closer to the lake; floating clouds, birds and luxuriant flowers all become part of the study of God's handiwork.

From our review vantage point read at one sitting Acts 7: 54 to 17: 34. Then go through the narrative again with map in hand and locate every place that is named. As suggested during the quarter, draw an outline map and insert just the names of the places as you come to them in the narrative. Draw a continuous line with blue pencil, connecting all places named on the first journey: Antioch in Syria, Salamis, Paphos, Perga, Antioch in Pisidia, Iconium, Lystra, Derbe, retrace to Perga and thence to Antioch in Syria. Follow the same method for the second journey, using a red pencil. If the map is large enough, pins can be placed at the location of the various cities and the routes indicated by colored worsteds. Should you have a better method, follow it; but make sure that you really know the map which portrays Paul's life. This map knowledge will help you to relate the events in Paul's life and to remember them for practical use.

NOW take your lesson quarterly, or the twelve last numbers of the Christian Herald, and name each title in turn, thinking through all the facts and their relationships as you come to the individual subjects. If you have Peloubet's Select Notes, turn to page 279 and you will find a complete outline to guide your meditation as you name persons and places, following each title. A Central Teaching is also given; but after this careful study you are prepared to name a key fact in connection with each lesson. Do not become a mere copyist in your lesson study. Take the best from all sources and then think hard as you prepare your own material for teaching, drawing your own conclusions from all the facts.

Paul's companions should be reintroduced. Every evangelist must have co-workers. These contribute in no small degree to the success of the man who is most frequently named as the leader. Barnabas, Mark, Silas, Timothy and Luke are the more prominent, though Ananias must not be overlooked. We can never forget the one who first gave us direct information concerning Jesus and the Way of Life. It was Ananias who said "Brother Saul, receive thy sight!" Who gave you the unmistakable information concerning salvation? Was it some one in your home, your Sunday-school teacher, your pastor, or a blessed friend?

By comparison of Bible incidents, reading books and Bible dictionaries learn all you can about each of these companions of Paul. If you will read Acts and all the Pauline epistles you will be surprised to note that Paul mentions at least 144 different persons by name. He lived among people and always worked for their uplift. In no sense was he a recluse. This is splendidly shown in the Golden Text, where Paul says, in writing to the Galatians, "So then as we have opportunity, let us work that which is good toward all men, and especially toward them that are of the household of faith."

Every one is urged to read a most fascinating and instructive book entitled "Making Good in the Ministry," by A. T. Robinson, professor of New Testament Interpretation at the Southern Baptist Seminary, Louisville. This book is a sketch of John Marks and the subject matter covers Paul, Barnabas, and others you have been following this quarter. Mark did turn back at Perga, as we studied, and Paul declined to have him go on the second missionary journey; but he won out and finally gave the world that blessed second gospel. Another fine Pauline book by Dr. Robinson is "The Glory of the Ministry."

STEREOPTICON pictures will be unusually valuable in placing the life of Paul and the places which he visited before the school on review Sunday. Every church and Sunday school should own a stereopticon. Where the Sunday-school room can be quickly darkened, slides portraying the lesson can be shown on any Sunday, and always following the lesson. Then all the pictures relating to the quarter should be presented in connection with the review. If it is not convenient or practicable to use the lantern on Sunday, these pictures, with the accompanying address, can be given at the mid-week prayer meeting following review Sunday. They can also be shown to advantage in connection with the Sunday-school social. Members of the home department should always be invited since they too have been studying these same lessons. If you cannot have stereopticon pictures, you can purchase good prints of great paintings which illustrate the lessons of the quarter.

During the coming three months all of Paul's epistles will come into view. It will be valuable to have in mind where the author was as each letter was written. In the margin of your Bible mark the names of the letters after each verse indicated, and at the beginning of each epistle write the name of the place from which it was written and the verse in Acts which is named herewith. Acts 18: 5—1 Thessalonians (Corinth); Acts 18: 11—2 Thessalonians (Corinth); Acts 19: 21—1 Corinthians (Ephesus); Acts 20: 1—2 Corinthians (Macedonia); Acts 20: 2 Galatians (Greece); Acts 20: 3 Romans (Greece); Acts 28: 30 Philippians, Philemon, Colossians, Ephesians (Rome). After the first imprisonment at Rome, Paul wrote I Timothy and Titus, and II Timothy was written during the second imprisonment at Rome. Dr. Robinson, whose books have been twice named in this lesson study, has prepared "The Student's Chronological New Testament" in which the books are printed, using the American Revised Version, in the order of their writing. A valuable introduction and synopsis is given in connection with each book.

Human Grasshoppers

TODAY—as I was hurrying back after luncheon to my office desk—I realized that the summer was definitely over. It came upon me with almost a sense of shock, that realization, for I had not allowed myself to dream that the autumn time was near, that winter was looming upon the horizon. One likes to think, when the summer days are long and golden, that they will follow each other quite endlessly. One likes to think that winter will never come.

And yet, today, as I was hurrying back to my desk, the signs of autumn were quite unmistakable. Very surely I noticed the curious tint that autumn skies take on—the haze that hangs low over rolling country hills and even high city buildings. There was a tang to the air that made one think, suddenly, of frost and snow and, in the far distance, of icicles.

Yes, autumn was in the spirit of the day. Autumn was in the very atmosphere of it. The sunshine was fairly spiky with its veiled suggestion. And yet the splendor of the season was dimmed by the indisputable knowledge that summer was going.

AS I walked rapidly through the sunshine, spiky though it was, a sudden sadness came to me. I was thinking, you see, of the things that I had planned to do in the summer—and that I hadn't had time to accomplish. I was thinking of the camping trip that I hadn't taken, of the long hours that I had meant to spend in a canoe, of the garden that I hadn't planted, and the jam that I hadn't put up. Of all those things I was thinking. And my heart was just a wee bit unhappy.

"Winter is almost here," I said to myself, "and I've left undone ever so many things. Why—why did the summer hurry so? Why didn't I have plenty of time for everything? It seemed in the spring as if I'd have no difficulty in making my plans work out. And yet the months have just rushed away from me."

So I spoke, quite alone in my heart. And as I spoke I blamed myself for wasting so many moments—for letting slip so many opportunities. I had spent too much energy over this task; I had lingered too long over that pleasure. So many unexpected, wee things had come up—things that might well have been passed by. I blamed myself, and did not allow even one tiny excuse!

"You're a grasshopper," I scolded, quite silently. "You're a grasshopper—and you ought to have been an ant! Busy people shouldn't allow themselves to be grasshoppers!"

ALMOST everybody knows the fable of the ant and the grasshopper—the fable of the diligent ant who worked systematically and efficiently all through the summer and the frivolous grasshopper who was content to play in the sunshine. Almost everybody knows how the ant tried to influence the grasshopper to be more provident; to join the ranks of the toilers. And how the grasshopper laughed and refused even to think of work while the weather was so delightful.

The grasshopper is such a charming fellow, in the fable, that one can not help liking him. He has such grace, such an air of nonchalance, such a way with him that you hardly mind his lack of common sense. You rather hope that he will come out on top. And yet the plodding ant, with his wisdom, is so certain, so infallible, that you feel sure he will come out on top. And so the end of the fable is not a surprise.

Almost everybody knows the fable down to its distressing close. For the winter comes—as it always does—and the grasshopper is left stranded while the ant, prosperous with the fruit of his toil, is able to sit back and say: "I told you so!"

It's not very pleasant, this fable—it's almost too true to be pleasant. One

They Find It Hard to Realize that Summer Must Go

feels that the ant is inclined to be snug and self-satisfied and that the grasshopper might be a good fellow, really, if he could only develop a sense of responsibility. One feels a shade of hopelessness in the inevitable climax; and one rather blames the ant for being so uncharitable, for not taking in the erstwhile care-free grasshopper. And yet, one can't help admiring the ant. Not only for his thrift, but for his infallible system.

When I compared myself to the grasshopper, I didn't mean that I had played all through the summer. On some of the hottest days (and this has been an exceedingly hot summer!) I have worked ever so hard. When I compared myself to the grasshopper, I meant that I had neglected to look ahead, to plan efficiently, to take time by the forelock. If the grasshopper in the fable had arranged his time better he might have done some work and some play. If I had arranged mine more skillfully I might have had more real achievement to my credit—such as the reading of worth-while books, and the making of clothes, and jars of preserves, and the like.

One can't advocate living the life of an ant—although it has its advantages in the end. For an ant's life is too grubbing—an ant never rises above his particular hill of dirt. One can't recommend the existence of a grasshopper, either—that would be encouraging lightness of mind. But, oh, if the human grasshoppers of this world could take on some of the ant's sturdy characteristics, some of the ant's amazing efficiency!

As I said before, it's the ant's system of working that's so wonderful. It's his way of fitting things in, of starting in another task, as soon as one is finished, that's marvelous.

DILIGENCE isn't the only thing, or thrift, or honest toil. Some thrift is misguided, and diligence has often been misplaced. It's steadiness and sureness of purpose, and the ability to make plans—and to carry them out, once they're made—that counts.

I dare say that a grasshopper makes some plans; vague, misty ones that go a-glimmering in the sunshine. I make plans, too, but many of them miscarry—many of them are never brought to a definite conclusion. And you, friends of mine, make plans, too—I'm sure of it—that don't work out. And so I'm something of a human grasshopper. And perhaps you are, too, just a tiny little bit!

Autumn is in the air today. The summer is back in the past with all of the other dear, vanished things, and the winter is stretching ahead. And I'm thinking, as the grasshopper must have thought, of the things that I might have done—of the dreams that didn't, after all, come true.

And I'm thinking that I'd like to go to the ant for advice. That I'd like to learn from the ant something about the system and efficiency that makes for real success in the carrying out of plans.

I'd like to go to the ant and learn what the word work really means. I'd like to learn how a number of tasks may be fitted into life like so many pieces of glass in a bit of mosaic.

The ant knows—and the grasshopper, for all of his charming and delightful characteristics, never will know! The grasshopper never will know anything but the pleasant things—and the final suffering and pain that comes when the pleasant things are done with!

Oh, friends of mine, I don't want to drain the carefree spirit of the grasshopper from my nature—I want to love the joyous freedom of being able to play, and to work at the things I enjoy.

But I want, too, to be able to see the summer go without a thousand vain regrets. And to watch the winter come in with a calm soul, and a welcoming smile!

Questions and Answers

O M., SUMMIT, N. J., writes: "Will you kindly tell me if there is any place here or elsewhere, in any country, where the old Jewish sacrifices—such as burnt offerings or sin offerings—are maintained, or are they all out of existence?"

We have submitted this question to an authoritative source, whose scholarship entitles him to respect. He writes: "There is no such place on earth at the present time. According to the instructions given to the Jewish nation in Deuteronomy 12:5, 7, also the 11th and 12th verses of the same chapter, there is only one place where God will accept sacrifices, and that is at the temple in Jerusalem. Since the Jews have been deprived of Jerusalem and their temple was destroyed they have been unable to obey the law as to sacrifices for the past 1,900 years. They have tried to ease their conscience all these years by teaching that God gave to the Rabbis the power to make modifications of the laws governing sacrifices, while they are in dispersion. Thus they have substituted, once a year, on the most solemn day of the year, the Day of Atonement, a chicken which is offered up for each individual Jew, as a sacrifice in place of the goat commanded by God. The Samaritans, who claim to be Israelites, assert that they have continued the sacrifices, particularly the Passover sacrifice, but this is doubtful."

Mrs. G. W. D., South Prairie, Wash., writes: "In the commandment, 'Thou shalt not make unto thyself any graven image or any likeness of anything,' could this be construed to mean that we should have no likeness or portraits of friends or relatives or landscapes, etc.?"

The language of the commandment explains itself. The Israelites were forbidden to make any of these things and to bow down and worship them, or the likeness of anything whatsoever. Idolatry in many forms was the besetting sin of the nations, and Israel fell into that sin many times. They had come out of Egypt—a land of idols—and they were subjected to many temptations in their journeyings. The commandment has no application in the sense you mention.

K. S. R., Princeton, N. J., writes: "The verse which J. J. B.'s friend quoted was from Daniel Defoe's 'The True-Born Englishman,' Part I, the first four lines, and run thus:

"Wherever God erects a house of prayer,
The Devil always builds a chapel there."

The thought has been expressed in almost the same words by Drummond, George Herbert Burton, and others."

W. C. Borden, Aberdeen, S. Dak., writes: "I send you an extract from an article sent out from Huron, S. D.: 'Farmers in ten states contributed 431 carloads of gift-corn for the relief of starving people in Europe and the Near East, according to a report from Carl Vrooman, general director of the gift-corn project for the American Farm Bureau Federation. South Dakota made one of the best showings in proportion to population and corn produced, with a gift of 31 carloads. The gifts of the other states were: Illinois, 147; Ohio, 67; Indiana, 44; Minnesota, 44; Iowa, 36; Missouri, 22; Nebraska, 20; Kansas, 16, and Colorado, 4.' Brown County, South Dakota, contributed one of these carloads of corn, and it is probably the farthest county north in the United States to make such a contribution. I am enclosing one of the big reasons why Brown County farmers responded so nobly. A farmer's heart is always large when it comes to helping a neighbor in distress. All he needs is to be properly informed of such distress. The Brown County Farm Bureau requested Mr. Alfred Wenz, one of its members, a real farmer, and a real writer, to write a short appeal to the farmers of the county for corn."

The Christian Herald has personal knowledge of the big-heartedness of the Dakota farmers. Mr. Wenz shows that he knows it also, for his article brought a record response from the Dakota farmers, going straight to the right spot—their hearts. All honor to the farmer, the first and foremost of industrials

(see Gen. 2:8) who is indispensable to the people on this globe of ours, for "he feeds them all."

Myrtle C. Gibson, Lawrenceville, N. Y., writes: "A short time ago I read in The Christian Herald, a most beautiful sermon. The topic was 'Divine Guardianship' by Rev. Junius Remensnyder. As I pondered after reading, it awakened in my mind many beautiful thoughts. How wonderful that God is able and does watch over me, even though I am often unconscious of His presence! He is always near and ever ready to help us if we only ask. If at times He seems far away, it is only because of our own sinfulness and pride. Then these words came to me and I write them down:

My Saviour guards: e'en though,
I oft times fail to see,
The loving touch, the helping hand
He reaches forth to me.

His watchful eye is over all,
His presence ever near,
To care or grief He brings relief,
And banishes my fear.

Give me the heart to understand
And do the Master's will,
In joy or strife, through all my life,
His bidding to fulfil.

I know if we only would stop to realize his loving-kindness. His unchangeable love, we would be more careful how we grieve Him. So many, many times we needlessly pain and grieve Him. If we do not control the unkind word, look and deed, they will grow and grow and finally become a fixed habit, which it is almost impossible to break."

Inquirer, Indianapolis. The question as to the contact of races is frequently a very disturbing one. Not knowing all the circumstances in the case you mention, we cannot assume to judge. As the matter is definitely settled, why not let it drop by avoiding further discussion?

Y. L. C. Fairfield, Neb., writes: "Who does the woman of the twelfth chapter of Revelation typify? Also, who does the Man-Child typify?"

There are many different interpretations of prophecy. Leading authorities in Jameson, Fausett & Brown's Commentary give the following which we reproduce, in substance: The woman (in Revelation, 12th chapter) clothed with the sun and with the moon under her feet, is the Church Universal. The sun typifies the spiritual or supernatural light, the moon the light which is connected with the world, and which of itself cannot dispel the darkness and change it into day; thus it represents the world-religion (heathenism) in relation to the supernatural world. The Man-Child represents the Son of God who is also the Son of man and the Spouse of the Church. You will find these and many other difficult points fully discussed in Dr. Patch's book on Prophecy now in press and shortly to be issued by The Christian Herald.

S. R. J., Harbor Springs, Mich., writes: "I must first say that I greatly enjoy reading The Christian Herald, especially the Editor's page, Sermon, and Daily Meditation. I am not an educated man, at least in a worldly sense, but am trying to answer the three questions you ask, as I see and understand them. 1. Yes, we have the Family Altar, morning and evening; have had it for nearly forty years. 2. We read a chapter, or Psalm, followed by prayer, and while reading, I also include foot-notes. 3. It should be made possible in every home. There is plenty of time for other things, why not for this? In what way could one spend the time more profitably, and surely it is necessary if we wish to grow in grace and in knowledge. A more form is not enough. It is not only a duty but a great privilege. A gray-haired man, who has been a professed Christian for years, said to me: 'I know very little about the Bible; I can't understand it. My first thought was, what have you been studying all these years?' I knew a bachelor farmer who boarded with a neighbor. This man was anything but a Christian, but they had family worship. Some years later, he was converted and soundly, I think. He said afterwards that the Family Altar had much to do with his conversion."

GRAHAM PATTERSON, PUBLISHER

Musical organizations help the church to hold the young and to win the older people

A children's chorus, with its own leader. What church would find it difficult to form one?

The Every-Day Mission of the Church

THE church of the new order offers the people an opportunity to serve each other as friends and as neighbors. If America is to realize that permanent social democracy which was the dream of its founders and which recently it realized for a swift moment when the great common cause of the war blotted out old lines of social demarcation, self-consciousness and class reserve, it seems that it must be largely through the church which is conscious of and responsible to the present-day challenge to wider service.

The social room offers a very happy center for the beginning of the church's wider service. Such a room, or such rooms—for modern church architecture provides for a series of them—should be thoroughly attractive, homelike and cheerful, with hostesses as concerned for the comfort and pleasure of the guests as if they were in their own homes. The opening of the rooms should be heralded by attractive posters, conspicuously displayed throughout the community, by signs, and by notices from the pulpit and in the local papers. The announcements should be original and attractive, calculated to arouse interest, even curiosity—and the people who come should not be disappointed! And the people of the community should be thus continually reminded of the open room.

The first essential of the room's social program is that it move along swiftly and spiritedly, leaving no one time to drift into a corner and wonder why he came. The secret of its success depends largely upon the quality of leadership available. Those in charge of group entertainment must have a spirit of contagious enthusiasm, and the ability not only to catch but to hold the enthusiasm of people of all ages. Those in charge of organization should have the knack of keeping workers busy and happy. Every group has its "born leaders" who will assert themselves as soon as given an opportunity, and with whose help, as in no other way, the program will grow broad and well-balanced. Sometimes these leaders do not know their own qualities of leadership, and experiment is necessary to prove along just what lines it lies, but all of this comes in time, once the work is started.

IN ORDER that outstanding talent may be immediately utilized and potential talent encouraged, the social recreation committee should send out a questionnaire addressed to every member of the congregation—and of the community, if possible—for narrowness of vision sometimes shuts out valuable workers. This questionnaire should be printed on cards of a size to be readily filed for future reference, and should contain the following questions, with dotted lines for answers:

Name?
Address?

The Social Program

By MARTHA CANDLER

Church Affiliation, if any?

What is your profession?

Vocation?

Avocation?

What Social Activities would you prefer seeing started in the church?

In which are you qualified to take leadership?

Will you serve whenever called upon?

In one community, a questionnaire, sent out in the form of a "Pool Your Talent Hobby Exchange," received a most hearty response. It read:

"You are asked to fill out the enclosed card containing the following provisions. 'I could show club groups how to ———.' 'I would like to learn how to ———.' 'I would be glad to entertain by ———.' This may be a chance for you to make some other fellow's dream come true and the other fellow may give you an opportunity to learn just the thing you have been wanting to know how to do. It's your big chance to help wake up this old city of ours to some good old-fashioned neighborly times and give us the finest kind of a get-together spirit.

"The following list is suggested, but need not limit you. If you are a man, woman, boy or girl, can you help in entertaining small or large social groups by piano-playing, singing, song-leading, song accompanying, instrumental music, reading, story-telling, folk dancing, stunts, games, leading, instantaneous cartoons, impersonations?

"If you are a woman or a girl can you show club groups how to sew, cook, embroider, decorate lamp shades, or other craftsman work? Can you direct simple dramatics? Have you any other specialty? Would you like to learn any of these?

"Men and boys, how about you?"

All suggestions for activities should be met open-mindedly, and those who offer them should be assured that such as are feasible will be started as soon as enough interest is forthcoming. An attitude of superiority or disdain, even momentarily, on the part of the leaders is fatal to the future success of the project. If the people can not be made to feel that the activities are their activities and the center their center, they will have none of it.

A GOOD time to launch a social program is on a holiday. Halloween, Thanksgiving, Christmas, Washington's birthday, for all of which entertainment features are easy to play. (The handbook "Rural and Small Community Recreation," published by Community Service, 1 Madison Avenue, New York, which incidentally contains many admirable suggestions and programs and sources of material, contains a year of holiday celebrations prepared by Constance D'Arcy Mackay, any of which may be followed by amateurs.)

A special evening for the strangers of the community should be a great success. There are always recent comers who still feel outside. Nothing makes them feel more at home nor more friendly toward the church than a special introduction party, and incidentally nothing limbers up the regular members and obviates self-consciousness like working to put others at their ease. One church in a large middle Western city a few years ago decided to take such steps as would enable the many strangers within its reach to become acquainted with other people of similar tastes and interests. There had been many requests for some such medium. At a first meeting everybody was introduced. There was a short program of music and addresses, and then the meeting adjourned into small informal groups to give people the opportunity to talk about the things in which they were most interested, and to find others with the same interests.

Forty people came to the first meeting, 96 to the next. Then 110, then 195. And by that time the attendance at small clubs which had been organized for various activities and pursuits averaged 290 weekly! A strange thing had happened. The people in the church got acquainted with each other while introducing the strangers! Women who had lived on the same block for years learned that they had remarkably similar hobbies, and forthwith began to cultivate them together.

An evening for the old folks of the town can be made very enjoyable to every one. In his book, "The Community Center," Mr. L. J. Hanifer suggests a program, "Ye Old-Time School Days," which will accomplish that rather difficult task of enlisting the active participation of both the old and the young people while furnishing enter-

THIS is the second of a series of articles by Mrs. Candler, who is associated with Community Service, Inc., and an authority on social and welfare activities, treating of the enlargement of the community work of the local church. Dealing, as it does, with specific methods instead of generalities, and giving sources for further study, it will be found of unusual value.

tainment for everybody. An evening of local history may also be planned to draw out the old residents, and will often result in the uncovering of picturesque and half-forgotten local traditions and legends. Such an evening in a Southern town led to a series of "historic walks," and later to the marking of old Civil War battle sites of the neighborhoods. Almost every section has some interesting and unrecorded local history. The old All Saints' Church in the heart of New York's lower East Side tenement section has established a museum into which many rare local relics have poured from members and former members, all closely associated with the growth of that once famous section where Lincoln quelled draft riots, and where later, for a little while, he lay in state after his assassination.

AN EVENING of music may consistently lead to widespread interest in musical organization and musical activities. It should lead directly to the appointment of a special Sunday afternoon committee to plan programs for that most troublesome time which has split more than one church-community project in twain. Organ recitals of good classical music always draw a wide and appreciative audience, especially when the numbers are interspersed with solos and quartets. The committee entrusted with the Sunday afternoon program has a wide opportunity for making friends. Local musicians are usually glad to give their services. The choirs of other churches respond cordially to invitations, and such a program oftener than not is the beginning of community-wide musical hours, with outdoor meetings in summer months, and with the winter programs held in various churches. San Diego, Calif., has enormous park signs which bring all churches together in this way.

Each Sunday-school class and group within the church should be trained into a chorus, and should, if possible, develop its own leader. This has happened in practically every church in Palatka, Fla., and in churches in the towns of Georgia and Indiana. The "Twice Fifty-Five" or some other good collection of secular songs and popular hymns should be used for preliminary singing, and all groups familiarized with the same songs so that when a big annual musical festival is planned, every one will sing the same songs. Oratorios, of course, require special practice.

In Logansport, Ind., recently, a novel song contest which might be put on by any church, with a little practice, was given by the public schools. A thousand children took part, each class having its own leader, and singing by rote. The group voted for by the most people received the prize, and widespread interest in the voting prevailing among parents and friends. The element of anticipated competition puts spirit into practice, and should not be lost sight of.

Quartets, string bands, glee clubs and orchestras result almost inevitably from the larger, looser organization for music. The musicians, with a headquarters for practice, come together almost spontaneously, and often stay together without leadership, to become a community social asset of no small importance. "The Community Orchestra," a handbook of practical suggestions for the new group will be found invaluable, and may be had direct from the author, Dr. Perry Dickie, 777 West End Avenue, New York City. An adult musical appreciation club has proved a great success in more than one community, operating as it usually does under the auspices of the general church-community musical organization. Such a club should be made up of people spontaneously drawn together by musical appreciation.

The orchestra under church auspices may become a community social asset of no small importance

NOTHING is more successful in bringing old and young together for a social good time than a good game, unless it is an evening of games. Shyness and diffidence vanish. Laughter prevails. In "Rural and Small Community Recreation," already mentioned, numerous programs are outlined, in which, in general, the "mixer" is followed by spirited games in which everybody participates, and in turn by team, or relay games. Musical games, mass and group "stunts," and magic are followed by refreshments, the special number, if any, of the program, and ten minutes of spirited song.

A musical story is always a popular addition to the program. It is immensely popular in England and France, but it is only now beginning to be played in America. It requires only a piano, a player, and cards and pencils enough for the assembly. The pianist states that he is going to tell a story, and when a break occurs in it, a few chords will supply the missing clue. Such a story, arranged by Constance D'Arcy Mackay, Community Service, begins: "There was once a young man named (Robin Adair). He was in love with a beautiful young girl whom he called (Katie, Beautiful Katie)." The ingenuity of the crowd might be tested by a prize contest offered for the cleverest original musical story written within a given length of time. "Tunes Dad Whistled" provided a successful evening recently in a long Island Baptist church. A few lines of some old-fashioned song were played, the leader avoiding using the opening bars, and a prize was given to the guesser of the most songs during the evening. The older people entered spiritedly into the fun, but a twelve-year-old boy, bore off the prize.

Other sorts of programs will suggest themselves. Meanwhile, as a result of the questionnaire sent out, small social club groups will have been formed, which, after they have had time to get well under way, will contribute to the general programs in many ways. One such group of young men and women voluntarily assumed a portion of a church debt by planning and putting on an "International Exhibition" in the big assembly hall of the parish house. Eighteen booths ranged around the walls represented as many nationalities. A man and a woman in the native costume of the country chosen officiated over each booth, which housed not only arts and crafts work of that nation, but refreshments characteristic of it as well. During the evening, talent, representing many of the nationalities—much of it mobilized from an industrial suburb of the town—appeared on the big stage at the end of the room. Music, folk dancing, and a pageant were given. The entertainment was so successful it was given by request in a park of the town's industrial district.

Before the social recreation committees have gone far, it is the usual experience to find that their problem is, not "What shall we do?" but "How in the world shall we get everything in?" And this even in a town which has before had the reputation of being dull and dead. For when the right spirit has been created the work gathers momentum tremendously.

The Worth of a Man

HAVE you ever wondered how much you were worth, how you were rated, not in Dun or Bradstreet, not in dollars or cents, but in the estimation of your fellow citizens?

Dun or Bradstreet may never have heard of Jim Goodheart, he may have a financial rating or he may not, but in his home town of Denver, Colorado, it is said that at the very lowest estimate he is worth $1,500,000 to the city and is equal to thirty policemen. Any time Jim Goodheart wants money to carry on his business all he has to do is to say so and Denver people put their hands in their pockets. They can afford to. It is the best investment they make. Jim Goodheart's business is saving souls, and $2.73 will save a soul.

There is a street in Denver where women do not go at night; where shoe shining "parlors" lodge in a hole in the wall; where pool halls catch the loiterers; where clothes that "have seen better days" are sold; where you can get a cup of coffee for a nickel served on the arm of your chair; where the sunshine is reflected from one set of golden balls—three in number—only to be caught by another set a few doors on, and on this street is a junk shop for wasted, broken, crushed and scrapped humanity. This is Jim's place of business. Its regular name is "The Sunshine Mission," but it is often spoken of as "the little house where God does so much"—God and His agent, Jim Goodheart.

Here they carry on the work of rebuilding, morally, men and women. Man may rebuild a city which has been destroyed, but only God can start with human wreckage and end with good. Here Jim Goodheart—tall, lanky Jim Goodheart with his winning smile and cheery, friendly voice preaches the Gospel in the good, old-fashioned way. Here 5,000 drifters a year

How Denver Rates Jim Goodheart, of "The Little House Where God Does So Much"

By ELIZABETH PALMER MILBANK

find their way and are fed and clothed first and then preached to and prayed with.

OUT of the depths of his own experience Jim Goodheart brings the understanding and the fellow-feeling that keeps him in touch with every down-and-outer. He once held a high position with a great future in sight, but was unable to stand prosperity and started downward. Position, home, reputation and self-respect were lost and he drifted with other derelicts. He came to Denver on a freight train, stumbled into the Sunshine Mission and found a helping hand and encouragement that shamed him and awoke dormant will power and a sense of right and wrong.

He got a position, paid his debts, took up the work of managing the Sunshine Mission, and in his turn held out a helping hand to others. He has been offered positions with big salaries, but he says he is fulfilling a part of a business contract. "I promised God if He would redeem me I would devote the rest of my life to Him. I have been on the job ever since." Once a year, on the anniversary of his re-birth, Jim tells the story of his spiritual death and regeneration, and every pastor in the city celebrates with him.

The doors of the Sunshine Mission are never closed, day or night. Every noon and every evening there is an hour of prayer. Outside, street cars rattle by, autos honk, teams clatter over the pavement, newsboys call "Extry!" but inside peace reigns. All is still except for a voice raised in prayer, a song, and occasionally a stifled sob.

Every Tuesday humanity's need draws fifty women there to make over old clothes. There is no distinction. Women from the most beautiful homes on Capitol Hill sit beside women with sunken cheeks, hollow-eyed sisters who have caught a glimpse of a better life and are anxious to aid those who still travel the broad and glimmering way.

A room back of the Mission is piled high with burglars' outfits, bottles that held nitro-glycerine, jimmies, blackjacks, tools of criminals which, but for Jim, might be in operation in the city. No wonder Denver people give gladly and generously to keep this Mission open. In five years 3,821 men and women whom this beachcomber has pulled out of the flotsam and jetsam, joined Denver churches alone. Jim receives hundreds of letters a day from converts telling of their progress, and he answers every one.

But he does not need these letters to give him confidence that those who are converted in the Sunshine Mission will make good and that they will hold fast in the Christian life. One sentence he is fond of repeating explains the reason for that confidence: "We teach our converts not to hold on to God but to let God hold on to them." And they do let God hold on to them and make them worth-while men and women.

Kindly, honest and earnest, Jim Goodheart wins souls because of his human sympathy. He meets a down-and-outer as man to man, and no questions are asked, no preaching is done until his physical needs have been attended to. Jim Goodheart feeds and clothes him and gives him the hand of fellowship, and Jim Goodheart wins out.

Many Answer Peace Endorsement Call

Flood of Replies Shows Churches Support President's Efforts

A NATION-WIDE response from churches of almost every Christian denomination and from many other organizations is now pouring in by every mail, addressed to the Peace Endorsement Committee, sponsored by the Christian Herald, showing how unanimously the churches of America support and approve President Harding in his efforts for World Peace and Disarmament. Although there has been only a short interval for answers, these responses come from almost every state in the Union, and there is a prospect that the number will be largely increased when those churches whose pastors are now on vacation, are heard from. In almost every instance the resolutions are signed by the pastor and the church-officers, or a committee representing the entire congregation.

Some of the letters are expressive of the highest enthusiasm for the cause of Peace and the greatest confidence in the ultimate outcome of the Conference. The writers see in the present situation an opportunity for the Church to place itself on record in one of the greatest efforts for world reform that has ever been attempted. At the same time, the writers are fully alive to the importance of the recognition by the Conference of the Divine Sovereignty and of the need of that wise direction which can only come from the Omnipotent Ruler.

Many of the endorsements received in response to our appeal come from churches and pastors who are well known to the whole American people and whose views can be considered with respect.

From Kansas City, Mo., comes a message of this character, representing the Bishop, Conference Superintendent, Ministers and lay delegates of Missouri Conference of the Church of the United Brethren in Christ, with a total membership of about 4,000 in its area, all of whom through their authorized officers, express hearty approval of the action of President Harding and pledge him every support in bringing about world peace. The resolutions are signed by Bishop Cyrus J. Kephart, and Roy E. James, Secretary of the United Brethren Conference.

FROM several churches belonging to the Friends, or Quakers, have come the same hearty approval and pledge of support which these ardent lovers of peace and righteousness commend with great goodwill.

Methodists, Presbyterians, Baptists, United Brethren, Lutherans, Moravians and Evangelical bodies all join in a fervent pledge of support for the task before the Conference, the success of which will mean so much to the peoples of the world.

The communication from the United Brethren Church Commission on Evangelism goes even further than the resolutions themselves and points out that "universal peace is impossible in the face of great armies and navies, which, in the nature of things stand in the way of a Christian settlement of international questions," and adds: "We believe it possible for the peoples of the earth to enter into an agreement in spite of designing politicians and professional militarists, to reduce war agencies to a minimum. Therefore, the ministers and lay delegates of the West Virginia Conference, Church of the United Brethren in Christ, assembled in the city of Elkins, and representing 23,000 members and twice that number of adherents, pledges its heartiest approval to the President and undivided support to his efforts for world peace." It is signed by Bishop W. M. Bell, Presiding Bishop, and Bishop W. M. Weekley, on behalf of the conference.

Doubtless during the coming week many more churches will be heard from until all the denominations have signified their approval of the object of the Conference and of President Harding's efforts. When the whole is complete, all will be submitted to the President, who, himself a sincere Christian and ardent churchman, will fully appreciate the widespread interest and the pledges given from those earnest people of all denominations who, as Aaron and Hur upheld the hands of Moses, are minded to give moral and physical support in every way possible to President Harding and the leaders in the coming struggle for world peace.

An Open Letter to President Harding

MR. PRESIDENT:
The invitation to a Conference to discuss the question of disarmament by the nations of the world has been called by you, and therefore to you the people look for a very important place in the discussion and the direction of its purpose.

You will, of course, be given plenty of advice and grave counsel by the press and platform of this country, inasmuch as there is a multitude of persons who feel capable of deciding for you the course you or the representatives of the United States ought to take. But this letter does not venture to define the plan or program of the conference as it shall face the different questions of naval supremacy, territorial rights, or balances of so-called power.

All that we, the American people, want to say to you at this time has very little to do with diplomatic or national policies. There is a world right which is greater than any national right. Through all the centuries since men first began to fight and kill one another, it is the common people of the world who have been the sufferers from war. Because a few kings or emperors or militarists believed in war as the method of settling national disputes, millions of innocent men and women and little children have paid the supreme penalty. We believe they have suffered long enough for the selfish ambition or greed or wickedness of a few individuals. The time has come for some world rights to be considered. The individual nations have had their personal grievances or rights before the public long enough. It is time the common people had a hearing.

And it is because of that great cry of the common people to have their case considered that we believe this conference has been called. You are a member of a church, you call yourself a disciple of Jesus Christ, your ancestors have been devout believers in Him, you read your Bible and believe in prayer. And we are taking for granted that so far as you, the President of the United States, are concerned, you have no other hope in your heart for this conference greater than the hope that the main thing will be accomplished.

And the main thing is DISARMAMENT. If the representatives of the countries that have accepted your invitation meet around the table to discuss selfishly their rights, regardless of the rights of mankind; if the arts and intrigues of diplomacy prevail over the needs of the common people, then the Conference will fail of the purpose which we believe rests in your own mind and heart.

But it is our hope and prayer, Mr. President, that the Conference will not fail. Is it not time that the welfare of mankind take precedence over the selfish claims of individuals? Are not the rights of the peoples of the earth greater than the so-called rights of any people? Is not the world need of peace greater than the national need of territory? Is not the cry of humanity greater than the cry of the militarist or the diplomat?

We anticipate that so far as you or those who shall represent the United States at the Conference can use their influence, this Conference will pass into human history as the beginning of the end of war. The prayers of millions of Christian men and women in America are being offered, during these days of hope, that Almighty God may grant to you the wisdom from above, and that you may live to see the time in human history which you yourself have helped to make, when nation shall make war against nation no more, and a real Brotherhood be born that shall create lasting peace and good-will among men.

Respectfully,

THE AMERICAN PEOPLE.

C. M. S.

God in the Conference

SEVERAL readers have written to the Christian Herald expressing the hope that in its open sessions the approaching Disarmament Conference may feel led to give due recognition to Almighty God and to invoke the divine wisdom and blessing upon the efforts to be put forth for the peace and well-being of mankind.

We have the confident hope that this will be done and that one of the strongest advocates of the step will be President Harding himself. Preceding his inauguration, speaking before the Marion Presbytery on the same platform with Mr. Bryan, the President-elect as reported in the New York Times, and other publications, said:

"I know how you were aroused to a great ideal of world relations, and how unhappy many of you were that we all could not see it that way. But you did not stop to think that in the conception of Versailles there was no recognition of God Almighty. I could not hope for a very happy relationship among nations unless there was a common thought among them in recognition of a Supreme Being."

This is a declaration not to be put aside, and we do not believe it will be.

That God alone is able to give enduring peace to the world is the conviction of every true Christian. Man may propose, but He is the Disposer. Many of our churches, whose pastors and congregations are now so loyally upholding the President in his efforts to make the Conference a success, are emphasizing in their communications to the Christian Herald the vital importance of imploring the divine wisdom to direct the Conference throughout. The churches of all denominations should not fail to have a special day of prayer that the Conference itself may plead for spiritual direction in all of its deliberations.

"Will God bless the Conference if He is not asked to do so?" is the question put by some of those who write us on the subject. The answer should be a volume of prayer not only from the churches, but from the homes, the workshops, and all the places of business, that the Conference and its doings might be under the divine sovereignty and leadership. At such a time it would be appropriate also to humbly ask forgiveness for the sins and shortcomings of all the nations alike.

Wicked Waste

THE average American citizen is a long-suffering creature. He is taxed to the limit locally and for national expenses. He bears the burden of high cost of necessities when strikes and industrial troubles raise the prices of commodities. And he is the innocent bystander who gets hit when politicians and interested parties tinker with the tariff or revise the tax laws.

But it does seem to him at times that he is the victim of misgovernment and blundering on the part of those who spend his money to an extent that is unbearable. As for example, when the shipping board takes 205 vessels which cost the people from $300,000 to $800,000 apiece by contract with a ship-building corporation and sells them to bidders at $2,100 apiece!

Yet that is just what was done the other day at Newark by the shipping board, providing the purchaser completes the required bond. The Commissioner, Edward C. Plummer, said that the board had devoted a great deal of time to the study of the bids, but considered that the best thing they could do under the circumstances would be to accept the offered price of $2,100 for a part of the fleet.

Of course every one knows that it is impossible to get the original value of any thing for any article, from an automobile to a typewriter, if it is what is known as second-hand. A man bought a new car and paid $2,500 for it, drove it home, met with a sudden reverse of fortune before night, drove the car over to the next house and sold it to a neighbor for $1,200. It was all he was offered and all he could get.

But when it comes to selling ships that cost $800,000 for $2,100, the proportion of original cost and the selling price is a little bit too much. At any rate it raises the question that the American people are asking with more and more emphasis, why is it that the business of the government is carried on at such a fearful loss and why is this waste permitted by the officials?

It is a curious fact that the average citizen looks upon what is called "the government" as something outside his own business, and almost a foreign body hired to do the business of keeping the country going. But what is "the government"?

It is the people as a whole. WE are the government. It is our money that shipping boards spend so freely and carelessly.

And whose loss is it that several of these $800,000 ships are going to be sold for $2,100? YOUR loss. Do you see the point, Mr. Taxpayer? Does it take an operation to get that into your skull? And is the shipping board the party that alone is to blame for this wicked waste of YOUR money? You would not let a clerk in your employ use your money in your business like that, would you? If you did, you would not have any business in a short time.

Why should the United States, at a time when it is in debt and when the taxes and costs of running the government are making even the average citizen sit up and think, be allowed to waste money, YOUR money, Mr. Taxpayer? What are you going to do about it?

Educated Doubt

THE alumnus of a certain well-known college was calling on the president of the institution just after the graduation exercises of Commencement day. The president was congratulating the father on the high standing of his son, who had been one of the members of the graduating class.

The father listened in silence to the president's flattering statements about the student, and then he said, with deliberation and some bitterness:

"Four years ago I sent my son here for a college education because it is my own college, and because I believed that he would receive here a full and satisfactory training in the fundamentals of manhood. I put my son in the care of this college and committed him in a very large and true sense to you. On the day of his graduation, I find that the one greatest thing in an education, as I regard it, is wanting in my boy. I refer to an enthusiastic religious conviction of life. You say he is intellectually brilliant, that he has led his class in mathematics and science. But in a frank talk I had with him this morning, he said to me that he was leaving this college without any religious convictions. In fact, he confessed that the course in Philosophy here had so unsettled his mind that he no longer believed in the Bible as he used to and that he was in doubt as to what to believe when it came to the person of Christ, the reality of the future life and a large part of the teaching he had received at home about prayer.

"I am not complaining about the fact of new ideas about theology or inspiration or miracles. What I am saying is that I left my son here to acquire the truth about life; and so far as his religious part of him is concerned, your teachers have not only failed to give him any enthusiasm about God and Jesus and the fundamentals of conduct, but they have succeeded in taking away the faith he once had, and have not given him anything to take its place. Granted that the religious faith he had when he left home was crude and needed to be enlightened, I would not object to any such enlightenment, but I do object to his being left without any light at all."

The president was very much embarrassed by the plain talk of this alumnus, and especially disturbed on account of the man's wealth and his ability to make a large contribution to the college. But the alumnus made it clear before he left the president's house that he would never make a gift of money to the school until the teaching was changed. His last words gave the president several meals for thought:

"I left my boy in your care. I understood that this was a Christian college. You were responsible for its religious influence. I cannot answer for other students, but I know that my own son came in here with a faith that was nurtured in a Godly home, and with a simple faith in prayer as his mother taught him from a child. And he is going out of here with no religious convictions, and no spiritual enthusiasm. The teaching of this college has robbed him of the faith he had, and put nothing worth-while in its place."

Is it saying too much to assert that the presidents of colleges have a responsibility at this point that cannot be evaded? With all the demand for more endowment for buildings and material equipment for colleges, is it not about time some attention was being paid to the kind of teaching that goes on in the buildings? If the colleges can truthfully be charged with turning out non-religious product, of what use is all the material equipment?

Lloyd George Sets Date for the Irish Conference

IMPATIENT over the prolonged exchange of notes, Premier Lloyd George has sent to Eamon de Valera, head of the Sinn Fein cabinet, a demand for a "definite reply as to whether you are prepared to enter a conference to ascertain how the association of Ireland with the community of nations known as the British Empire can best be reconciled with Irish national aspirations," with a proposal that the conference should be held at Inverness, Scotland, on September 20.

The Premier declared again that it was impossible to enter a conference based on an interpretation of the "principle of government by the consent of the governed" which would commit him to the setting up of an Irish republic or repudiation of the Crown, arguing the application of the principle in that way would undermine the fabric of every democratic state. On the other hand he offered to discuss guarantees on any points in which Mr. de Valera may consider Irish freedom prejudiced by the British proposals.

It was regarded as certain, both in Dublin and London, that the Sinn Fein cabinet would accept the Premier's invitation and that the substitution of verbal parleys for the exchange of notes would bring results much more rapidly. The question of Ulster was not mentioned in the Premier's letter and even though the other obstacles are surmounted it will prove a serious difficulty to a final settlement, for there has been not the slightest sign of yielding in Belfast.

League Is Criticized in Assembly

CRITICISMS of the League of Nations have been perhaps the most notable feature of the session of the League Assembly now in session at Geneva. From the small nations there have come new protests against the domination of the League Council by the great Powers, a condition which has been a source of great dissatisfaction from the beginning, and objections to the expensive scale on which the Secretariat is organized. A spokesman for such protests was Hjalmar Branting, of Sweden, who declared the League was not accomplishing what the world expected of it.

From Lord Robert Cecil, representing South Africa, there came a strong criticism regarding the small progress made toward disarmament and an expression of gratification that on this question the American government and the League had the same general purpose. The League's delay in instituting the system of mandates—a delay declared to be working a hardship on the peoples of the mandated territories and to be spreading a belief that the mandates are only a camouflage for annexation—he declared to be the fault of the American government, which has protested against definition of mandates without its consent but has failed to reply to League communications on the subject. The Harding administration, however, has disclosed its views to the principal Powers and they thus have gone indirectly to the League.

A lessening of the League's influence outside Europe was threatened through controversies involving South American countries. Bolivia's demand that the League take up the Tacna-Arica dispute so as to give her an outlet to the sea was opposed bitterly by Chile, and the delegation of each country was threatening to withdraw if its demands were rejected. Chile was invoking the Monroe Doctrine, arguing that the question was purely an American one in which European nations should not become involved, and that the Monroe Doctrine was recognized by the League Covenant. Several South American countries were not represented at the early sessions, and with Argentina virtually out of the League because of delay on amendments demanded by her, the League's prestige in the Western hemisphere was suffering and further withdrawals were not probable.

provisions in which this government is not interested. It was suggested in Paris that a treaty between the United States and the Allies might be necessary to place the settlement of peace throughout the world on a proper legal basis. The main provisions of this treaty would be American recognition of the validity of the European frontiers and political conditions established at Versailles and of the disposition of German rights and interests outside Europe, while the Allies would recognize America's right to all she claims under the Berlin treaty.

That the Allies would refuse to approve the Berlin treaty was not expected for a moment. America's position is too strong for that. And in Washington high officials declared all information in their hands indicated that the Berlin treaty was satisfactory to the Allies. The text was communicated to the Allies as a matter of diplomatic courtesy, it was explained, but no formal replies are deemed necessary. American officials saw no impairment of Allied rights, and the only American-Allied treaty considered probable by them was one to cover the mandate question.

Conference of Methodists

A RELIGIOUS assemblage of the first magnitude—the World's Conference of Methodists, representing upwards of 40,000,000 adherents—has been in session in London, with delegates from many lands and from the several branches of Methodism participating harmoniously and enthusiastically in its work. Naturally, Methodist union was one of the chief topics on the program and the addresses stressed the need of closer bonds between the various branches. Bishop Mouzon, of the Methodist Church South in the United States, said all branches were united solidly on all vital matters and divided only on the question of administration, and his declaration that the two great Episcopal Methodisms in America "must be one, or must answer before the judgment bar of God" brought forth loud applause. Sir Robert Perks expressed a belief that a union of all the Methodist churches was on the eve of accomplishment, and other speakers pleaded for reunion.

Of such wide international scope, the conference did not limit its discussions to religious matters. Messages of greetings were sent to President Harding and King George, voicing an earnest hope for world peace. That to Mr. Harding said Methodists everywhere would watch with prayerful attention the practical proposals made by the American Government to secure peace without resort to war. The coming international conference on limitation of armaments received much attention, and the deepest anxiety that it should be fully successful was expressed.

American Delegation Named

EACH main delegation to the Washington conference on limitation of armaments is to consist of four members, according to a White House announcement which revealed the complete list of American delegates. Secretary Hughes and Senator Lodge previously had been named. Sitting with them will be Elihu Root, former Secretary of State, former Secretary of War, former senator from New York and an American member of the Hague Tribunal; and Senator Oscar W. Underwood, long the Democratic leader in the Senate. This list generally was regarded by the newspapers, both Democratic and Republican, as perhaps the strongest Mr. Harding could have designated and as thoroughly competent to represent the nation in a gathering of such importance.

BOUND FOR THE MISSION FIELDS OF CHINA AND JAPAN

An imposing array of Gospel messengers, you will say, but it fails to include all of the more than 100 missionaries who sailed from Seattle recently on the Admiral liner Hawkeye State for service in the Orient. Most of them were going out for the first time, and for more than a score it was a honeymoon voyage. Several denominations were represented.

Allies Perplexed Over Berlin Treaty

WHAT to do regarding the German-American peace treaty is causing no little concern in the foreign offices of the Allied governments. It presents an unprecedented diplomatic situation, and the responsible officials are going carefully into all phases of the matter before committing themselves. The Berlin pact is unlike any other in that it includes much of the Versailles treaty, and the fact that the United States has expressly dissociated itself from responsibility for many provisions of that treaty creates a situation fraught with considerable potential danger to some of the Allies—at least in the French view. The sections relating to European boundaries, for instance, are excluded from the Berlin treaty and the return of Alsace-Lorraine to France thus not included, so that there is a fear in Paris that Allied recognition of the German-American treaty might give to Germany a means of blocking observance of those Versailles

A Story of a City Church

By MARION HARLAND

Illustrated by William C. McNulty

THE Hailes were to take an afternoon train to Marlinton and soon after breakfast on the morning succeeding the "Demonstration," Mrs. Barrows accompanied her friend upon an important shopping expedition, leaving the two men in close confabulation in Dr. Barrows's study.

"I can't get the image of poor old Stenson out of my head, as he sat there in a crumpled heap looking ten years older than he did a month ago," Dr. Barrows was saying. "My wife—who I needn't tell you is one of the cleverest women alive—will have it that it was not the surprise that knocked him over, but the nature of it. As she said last night, she is behind the scenes so far as their private means are concerned, and she is positive that all that gammon about secrecy as to the nature of the surprise awoke in the Stensons' mind a fond hope that some provision would be made for their old age. It goes without saying that his professional life is ended. Nobody doubts that. He has crossed the dead-line and put up the bars after him. God help him!"

He brought it out with genuine feeling, striding up and down the floor and beating his palms together.

"This isn't a digression, although it may look like one. You and Stenson were made of like material, albeit not after the same pattern. You will make a brave fight before you collapse. So did he, but you saw the end of it. Take my advice and accept as inevitable the peculiar trials of our profession. One of them nearly floored Stenson thirty years ago. You are too young to have heard of it. He was a good-looking chap then and with the grace of manner which came back to him in a measure last night. There is game blood in him yet.

"A woman took a fancy to consult him with regard to her spiritual struggles—how I detest the phrase! She wrote letters to him by the quire and dogged him on the street and made occasions to call on him and to have him call upon her. He told me afterwards that he feared she would lose her reason in the intensity of her fears that she had committed the unpardonable sin. At last the busy-bodies began to talk, and hints crept into the papers of a 'scandal in clerical life,' and the injured husband to the front. The tale is as old as the hills. Mrs. Stenson stood by her husband like the true, brave woman she is, and so, to their lasting honor be it said, did the Church. He proved of what mettle he is by demanding a thorough investigation and the cancer was laid open. There was not an atom of truth in the tale. The husband had to confess that, knowing his wife to be of unsound mind, he had let her weave the infernal web in the hope of freeing himself from the marriage tie. The poor woman died in a sanitarium a few years later.

"Don't be offended, Haile, if I call your attention to this one of divers pitfalls that may be laid for your feet. You have charms of person and manner, and the church at large is overstocked with sentimental sisters. Don't work the pastoral duty too hard. I am saying all this out of love for you such as your father might feel, were he in my place."

HE SAT down and laid his arm about his friend's shoulders. Haile turned his cheek to rest upon the speaker's shoulder as if he had been in truth his father.

"I thank you with all my soul. You have the right to be frank with me. Indeed, it is your duty. But for you I should probably have hesitated to exchange a charge that satisfied me entirely for one involving such responsibilities as that I now hold. My whole heart is a sobbing prayer that I may be convinced by future events that I have acted wisely."

The big hand patted his shoulder.

"I have no doubt of that! My apprehension is that the command to 'Come up higher!' could not be more clear if the call had been in an audible voice. I grant that the responsibility is great. So are the opportunities for doing the Lord's work. There are hardly three richer congregations of our denomination in this city, for one thing—"

He paused, for Haile's impatient gesture had shaken the caressing hand from its resting-place.

"That is the least of the recommendations of the Banner Church to me! It is a sordid consideration and to my notion inconsistent with the spirit of the Master Who, I hope and pray, may show why I have relinquished home and the people of my first love for a new sphere of thought and action."

"See here, my son!" facing squarely about to look directly into Haile's eyes. "Don't be a fool! And an ungrateful fool at that! Money is as essentially the Master's gift to His church as the influence of the Spirit."

"St. James held a different opinion!" He was shocked and indignant and took no pains to conceal it.

"In the first century? I grant it. We are living and laboring in the twentieth. I am not an avaricious man. My detractors have not yet accused me of greed for filthy lucre. The man who made that phrase should have been a mind-reader and sat beside me behind the Communion table last Sunday. I computed—and the estimate fell short of the right sum—that my middle aisle represented between fifteen and sixteen millions of good money. Ah! I knew that would horrify you. Time was when I should have cried out against it as blasphemy and sacrilege. Sit down, man! I can't talk when you are striding about in such a fashion. Now, strike, but listen. As I counted those millions mentally and thanked God fervently for the thought, I seemed to see a heathen world lying in wickedness and sin and myriads of unregenerate souls in the dark places of our so-called Christian land, to whom the Gospel should be carried by men who are waiting and anxious to be sent upon the glorious errand, and who—you know this as well as I do—can not go for lack of the funds required for the undertaking.

What Has Gone Before

SILAS FORD, the dominant figure in the fashionable Banner Church in New York City, is profoundly impressed while on a visit to the home of Robert Lawson in Marlinton, a few miles distant, by the preaching of Rev. Stuart Haile, whose ten-year pastorate there has been extraordinarily happy and successful. The leaders of the Banner Church have determined on the resignation of their pastor, Rev. Dr. Samuel Stenson, because they believe that at the age of sixty-three he is too old for the best interests of a modern city church conducted with strict regard for businesslike efficiency, and a committee goes to Marlinton to hear and see the minister whom Mr. Ford had proclaimed to be a "find." Rev. Mr. Haile's first intimation of the call comes in a letter from Rev. Dr. Calvin Barrows, a New York pastor, who urges its acceptance because of the larger opportunities for Christian service. Mr. Ford follows it up with a personal call on the minister, who regretfully decides to accept. The Banner Church makes much of welcoming the Hailes and stages what its members call the "Unique Demonstration" for the retiring and incoming pastors. Dr. Stenson faints when he learns that the "great surprise" planned for him is the naming of a mission house in Korea for him.

"Do you wonder that with all this in mind I coveted with a godly longing those millions and thanked God that He had put it into my power to turn some of them into the right channel? We ministers of the Gospel are often accused of courting the rich, sometimes to the neglect of the poor. May there not be a partial justification of this in the motives I have just indicated?

"If not, then we are a sorry lot of failures, for we all bow in the House of Rimmon, under the pretence of making the dishonest methods of men to praise Him in the end. Look at the richest member of the Banner Church, your ardent admirer, Silas Ford. He is in the main a good enough sort as millionaires go—kind-hearted and ready to do his duty to God and man so far as he knows how to do this. If, as is currently believed, he is making money hand over fist, transmuting whatever he touches into gold—or, we will say gilt-edged stocks—he declares that he considers his wealth as a deposit held for charitable and religious purposes. He is underbred and half-educated, yet he was unanimously chosen as the orator and representative of your parish last night. If he magnifies his office who can blame him?"

"TO MY way of thinking, all this is rank sophistry," returned Haile steadily. "True, the Master asserts that the 'gold and silver are mine.' I can not think it honest to cozen Dives into lending to the Lord, and hugging himself complacently while doing it."

"Hear! hear!" laughed the imperturbable Barrows. "It is good for Midas to be relieved of the burden of his riches and, let me say seriously, oftener than not a means of grace." "A roundabout means!" rejoined the other, lightly, pulling out his watch. "Can it be half-past eleven! I am to meet Mr. Ford at the Church House and lunch with him when we have finished our errand there. I shall be back in good season for the three o'clock train. Thank you for posting me with regard to twentieth century ecclesiastical ethics. Good morning!"

When Mrs. Haile and Mrs. Barrows returned to luncheon

after their shopping they found a note, two cards and a florist's box awaiting them. A lady had called in her ear, reported the maid who admitted them and led the way to the library. She had asked for both the ladies and left cards for them besides asking to be shown into the library where she could find paper and pen. She had wished to leave a note for Mrs. Haile.

The recipient read it aloud to her hosts, Dr. Barrows having just entered:

"DEAR MRS. HAILE:

"I am sadly disappointed at missing you. I am dying to tell you how delighted we all are at the triumphant success of our Reception of last night. Nothing could have been finer than the manner in which you and Mr. Haile played your parts in the program. We are all the more impatient to have you here as our very own and permanently. Please accept these flowers as a slight token of regard and appreciation from

"Yours faithfully,

"Praise from Sir Hubert Stanley!" said Dr. Barrows between his teeth.

And his wife—"I never knew what her initials were before. Her card says 'Mrs. Robert Malcolm Wingate.' She clings to her husband's name. I wonder what 'L. L.' stands for. A sentimental mother may have had her christened 'Letitia Landon.' A frivolous mother may have dubbed her 'Lucy Locket.' In any case the initials are prophetic of the 'Leading Lady.'"

ONE blustering morning in the second week of March, Mrs. Haile sat, expectant, curious and not without trepidation in her

Making the Nation Christian

A Sermon by REV. FRANCIS E. CLARK, D.D., LL.D.*

TEXT—Psa. 33:12. "Blessed is the nation whose God is Jehovah."

ST. PAUL lived in a corrupt and godless age. Rome was near the very peak of her national wickedness. The unspeakable Nero was Paul's emperor, for the apostle was a Roman citizen, and yet, in the strongest terms, in writing to the Roman Christians, he adjured them to obey the laws.

In words that would seem servile and mean-spirited to the modern anarchist and to many socialists, he writes: "Let every soul be in subjection to the higher powers. . . . The powers that be are ordained of God. Therefore he that resisteth the power, withstandeth the ordinance of God. . . . For this cause ye pay tribute also; for they are ministers of God's service, attending continually upon this very thing. Render to all their dues: tribute to whom tribute is due; custom to whom custom; fear to whom fear; honor to whom honor."

In other words, honor your rulers, obey the laws, pay your taxes.

Was Paul, then, a mean-spirited opportunist, trucking to oppression and injustice and advising his followers to do the same that they might save their lives and property? At first blush it looks so, but there are several things to be remembered. On the whole, the Romans, though not seldom ruled by wicked or insane emperors, were given just and wholesome laws and these laws were enforced. Rome's great gift to the world was the Majesty of Law, and all orderly, civilized government must be based on this principle.

We fret at the slowness of our courts, at the seeming injustice of some decisions, at the taxes we are obliged to pay, and we are inclined to say at times, "The laws are frauds and government is a farce; let us get back to primitive times when every man was a law unto himself and did that which was right in his own eyes."

Many a drinking man, since prohibition has become the law of the land, has cursed the law, cried out for "personal liberty," and felt as one of them has declared, that he would "rather live in the heart of savage Africa than in a law-cursed country like America." But would he? Let him try it for a month, in the squalor, filth and bestiality of an African kraal, and a country which even takes away his "personal liberty" to drink a glass of beer at a bar would seem like paradise to him.

ADMITTING that our laws are imperfect, that our judges are faulty, that our taxes are excessive, Paul's exhortation still should be obeyed. "Let every soul be subject to the higher powers." The alternative of unlawful resistance is usually so much more terrible that it cannot be entertained. Anarchy and lawlessness are so much worse than obedience to imperfect laws, that only a madman or a fool can advocate them. Revolution is justified only by intolerable tyranny.

To realize this one has only to recall the events in Boston during the policemen's strike in 1919. I happened to reach Boston after a short journey, early in the morning of the day after the strike. Only twelve hours before the guardians of the law had turned in their badges and batons. Only one night had the city been without police protection. Yet the streets were strewn with splinters of glass; great show-windows costing hundreds of dollars were shattered, and their contents looted. Boston was full of evil-looking hoodlums. Many groups of men and boys, undisturbed, were "shooting craps," or intent on other gambling games, on the Common, or blocking some streets, so as to make traffic almost impossible, while many stores were locked and barred, to avoid further depredations.

All this was the result of a single night of lawlessness. Multiply this by the days and nights of a week, a month, or a year, and one can realize to what a state of helpless ruin a city or nation would soon be reduced, where none were "subject to the higher powers."

For the first time most of the people in Boston realized what a thin veneer of civilization covered the ugly realities of our civic life; how law, and that law enforced by authority and power, alone stood between the city that was the Pilgrim's pride, and utter anarchy.

The first requisite of a good citizen, then, is to respect and obey the laws. In other words, to make our nation Christian—for a Christian nation is a nation made up of good citizens—we must cultivate respect for and obedience to law.

Very likely there are inequalities and injustices in the law as administered in Boston and every other city, but that is no excuse for lawlessness. "Wherefore ye must needs be subject, not only for wrath, but also for conscience' sake," writes Paul. "For this cause pay ye tribute also," he continues. This and the following verses refer to the very obvious, but to the often unpleasant, and in these days difficult, duty of paying our taxes.

I AM not clear as to the wisdom or rightness of certain conscientious objectors, who live in democratic countries and who refuse to pay their taxes because of disbelief in the laws that impose them, like our oversea friends who refuse to pay taxes for certain church schools. I admire their heroism, which led them to see their property sold over their heads, or to endure weeks in prison, rather than pay taxes which they thought were unjust. They may have been right, but I think there was a better way to reform the law, in a country of universal suffrage.

However, with most of us, conscience does not enter into tax-paying. Our taxes are burdensome, but they are not unjust, and we should consider it as much a Christian duty to pay them as any other bill. Indeed it should be done joyfully, for by this payment we are helping to defend not only our own lives and property, but

United States. A miracle has come to pass under our very eyes. No more wonderful reversal of public opinion can be imagined than the passage and quiet acceptance of the 18th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States of America. Half a dozen years ago the possibility of such an amendment would have been scouted by three-quarters of our people as the "wild dream of beardless enthusiasts"; to half our people, addicted more or less to their cups, it would have seemed not only a dream, but a nightmare.

Here was a proposed reform against an evil entrenched in the social customs of the centuries; buttressed by the interests of a mighty business and high finance, defended not only in halls of legislature but in some pulpits, and by some whole denominations. Here was a cause whose advocates were derided and sometimes mobbed, and against which the most widely circulated dailies in the country constantly thundered.

Yet the miracle has occurred. The impossible has been accomplished, and January 16, 1920, was a new Independence Day, a day that deserves to be celebrated in the ages to come as the day of the Declaration of Independence of the greatest and most prosperous of nations from the shackles which had bound mankind during all the ages of the past.

How was this amazing change in the sentiment and social habits of a nation brought about? Not by violence or by revolution. Carrie Nation with her little hatchet, to be sure, broke the decanters and plate-glass windows in some lawless saloons in Kansas. But her hatchet, however well-intentioned, helped the cause but little. It was by the slow process of education through school text-books, through Sunday-school lessons, through young people's meetings and conventions, through sermons and addresses and books and tracts and personal persuasions, that the good work was done.

The marvelous result seemed to come suddenly, but really it was the culmination of long years of steady, persistent, untiring effort on the part of a multitude of Christian citizens that at last put this Christian law upon our statute books, and into the permanent law of the land.

To cultivate obedience to law, to see that there are laws to be obeyed, which are in accordance with Christ's teaching, are two of the ways to make our nation Christian.

THE most obvious method of making our nation Christian I will not dwell upon at length, simply because it is so obvious. That method is to become more earnest and faithful followers of Christ ourselves, and to lead as many as we can influence into the same fellowship.

A nation is not an abstract quantity like a sum in arithmetic. It is not chiefly a code of laws or a constitution. It is made up of individuals. What the units are, that is the nation, and the units are the men and women, the boys and girls, whose names are recorded in the census report. A nation cannot be better or more Christian than the people who compose it. A nation with perfect laws will be perfect or imperfect only as the people obey or flout them.

This conception, then, brings us, as we close, to a very practical thought. We are individually responsible for our part in making this a Christian nation. Every fresh and sincere consecration of ourselves to Christ's service makes this a more Christian nation. Every person whom we persuade to accept Jesus' principles of conduct and Jesus Himself as his personal Saviour is making this a more Christian nation. Every boy and girl whose feet we can turn into the way of life is helping to make this nation Christian.

Patriotism and religion, love of country and love of the Master, join hands in giving us a mighty motive for quiet personal evangelism. All exhort us by word and deed, by example and precept, to win the individual, that our country may be won for Christ.

Another word may be added to Harvard's ancient motto. "For Christ and the Church and our Country" should be the watchword of every disciple of the Nazarene. Only by a nation of godly men and women can we secure the Psalmist's beatitude: "Blessed is the nation whose God is Jehovah."

THE summer-term graduation class of the Moody Bible Institute numbered eighty students, thirty-five men and forty-five women, who had completed the two years' course in the Bible, gospel music and practical methods of Christian work. These students came from twenty-five different states and four foreign countries. Twenty-four of the graduates plan to go to foreign mission fields; nine will take up home mission work; ten will enter the pastorate; and seven will do evangelistic work.

In Jesus' name we ask it. AMEN.

that of all our poorer neighbors, and to preserve the life of our nation, our commonwealth, and our community.

"Are these the arguments of the capitalist and the money-king?" does someone ask? At any rate they seem to be the arguments of the great apostle.

But let us balance this view by turning the shield around and looking at the other side. If we should strive to make our nation Christian by obeying and sustaining the laws, it is equally our business to use all our influence, by voice and pen and vote, to make our laws just and Christian. Christian laws go far to make a Christian people. Though it is true, as some people are so fond of telling us, that you cannot make a people moral by legislation, it is equally true that bad laws, and equally good laws unenforced, make a people immoral, sap the foundations of the state, and make lawbreakers, rebels and anarchists. Sooner or later such laws lead to revolution and chaos.

Then it should be the consciously accepted duty of every Christian man to interest himself in political and civil life, to go to the polls wherever he can cast a vote, to scrutinize the character of the man he votes for, and, in these days of the referendum, to make sure of the righteousness of the measures for which he casts his ballot.

It should also be his duty to contribute his part to the education of the public; to the creation of a righteous public sentiment that will go far to place good laws upon our statute-books, and to secure their enforcement when they are there.

NOTHING can better illustrate the mighty power of aroused and educated public sentiment than the passage of a nation-wide Prohibition law, and its embodiment in the fundamental Constitution of the

Cosmic Vengeance

SUNDAY. Judges 5:20. "The stars in their courses fought against Sisera." Is that merely a poet's judgment, an attractive flight of poetic fancy? Have the stars anything to do with Sisera as he wages his mad campaign? Is there any vibratory influence between them, any secret commerce of communion or repulsion? Or do the stars just "blindly run," and have they no sort of connection with Sisera, whether he be found in ways of rebellion or ways of obedience? Have the stars anything whatever to do with Sisera? Is it just a fragment of a poet's dream? Or is it stern reality?

Let us say that it is the consistent teaching of the Word of God, that the connection is both real and constant. The scriptures of the Old and New Testaments declare that the material world is either friendly or unfriendly to our souls. The natural order of the world is not one thing, and the spiritual order another thing. Natural law and spiritual law are not aliens whose decrees run in two quite separate and independent worlds. If a man rebel against the Lord, he is antagonizing the purpose which runs through the material universe, and therefore the visible universe is against him. Not a stone on the road is for him, not a flower of the field is on his side. Not one of God's winds has his concerns in friendly custody. Neither summer nor winter fling any protecting guardianship over his soul. He has entered into an alliance with sin: and the scriptures affirm that when we sin there is a cosmic vengeance in the world. We are at warfare with the universal order. "The stars in their courses fought against Sisera."

Let us appeal to our own experience. Who does not feel the rupture of our intimate fellowship with nature when the soul is traveling along ways of trespass and rebellion? What sort of vital intimacy have we with sweet and lovely things—with flowers or birds? What real kinship do we enjoy with mountains or seas? We are sternly shut out of their friendship. We are not allowed in the holy place of their temple: nay, we are excluded from their outer courts. Nature becomes a sealed book. The sunniest sky becomes as brass. All the ministries of the natural world are against us, and we know and feel the estrangement.

If we turn to the great tragedies of Shakespeare, we find that the teaching of scripture is repeated. The material world and the moral world have mutual currencies of vital kinship. Man and the universe are not moving in independent orbits, where one has no correspondence with the other. In Shakespeare's tragedies nature sides against the rebel. Nature takes up arms against him when he takes up arms against God. The material world is in wild resentment when man lifts his hand against the Lord. Such is the teaching of Shakespeare. There are some mystics in our own day who make the suggestion that our communion with nature is more intimate than we have dreamed and that our moods can woo or restrain it. They go so far as to teach that an evil disposition can affect a plant, like a bad gas, and that a gracious spirit inspires a plant, like a vitalizing air. That is a mystical suggestion, but there may be more in it than we suppose. But we are on the rock of scripture-teaching and personal experience when we hold that nature is not our friend when we are God's enemy. A willing ally is ranged against us—"The stars in their courses fought against Sisera."

There is a bright side to all this: nature is on our side when we are on the side of God. The universe is with us when we are with God. "I will make a covenant between thee and the stones of the field." It is the word of the Lord. Nature puts on her bridal attire when the soul comes home to God. "The wilderness shall blossom as the rose." Every lovely thing is friendly. Every natural law is our ally. "The whole earth is fully of His glory!" And if we, too, glorify the Lord, the whole earth is on our side.

An Age of Gospel Progress

MONDAY. Josh. 24:2. "Your fathers dwell on the other side of the flood." The present unrest and confusion among all nations must not be taken as an unfavorable sign. The cataclysm that has followed the World War is like the freshets of the lower Mississippi that, while involving many incidental losses, make for the improvement of a thousand plantations. I have watched the rising backwaters of that great river rolling the wrong way, apparently, for endless miles: but in the distance boats could be seen following the deep channel toward the Gulf. Here is the logic of optimism; God's purposes never fail. His river, freighted with the argosies of the future, rolls ever onward toward the Golden Age.

Is life worth living, then? "In an age on ages telling, to be living is sublime." Let us be thankful that we dwell this side of the flood. We have also received from our fathers a goodly heritage of righteousness; that is, of truth expressed in terms of common life.

The standards of personal character were never so high as now. The Decalogue and the Sermon on the Mount have found their way into the very nerve and sinew of most men. Sin is still here; but in forms of flagrant vice it is far less fashionable than it used to be. Gambling, duelling, drunkenness and marital infidelity are under the ban. The world expects more of any man, who would be counted respectable, than it did in former days.

It is glorious to be living now. The gleanings of the grapes of Ephraim is better than the whole vintage of Abiezer. Farewell to the past, to the darkness of vice and oppression; and welcome the light. D. J. B.

The Great Quest

TUESDAY. John 14:8. "Philip saith unto him, Lord, shew us the Father, and it sufficeth us." Thus Philip gave utterance to the eternal cry of the human heart. Through the ages, men have given themselves to great quests. In fact and in fancy they have gone in search of new worlds, more money, greater fame. The Holy Grail and the Golden Fleece have lured them on. In their quests they have spent time and strength and life. All these lesser quests have paled into insignificance, and seemed unworthy indeed, with neither the power to control men's lives or command their interests, by the side of "The Great Quest"—man's quest after God. Whether it be Abraham with the knife drawn over the heart of his son, or the prophets of Baal causing their children to pass through the fire, or the sainted John alone on Patmos, Isle, or the poor mother of Africa offering her only child, or the benighted son of India walking on his board of spikes, or the scholar in his study, or the monk in his cloistered cell, or the misguided woman going to the confessional, or you, in your seat on the Lord's day—it is The Great Quest that lures all.

It is not that man would know that God is. It is only the fool who hath said in his heart that there is no God. It is rather that men would know what God is like. If Christianity has any right in the world, she must answer the yearning of the heart, that men and women on the great quest shall not end in a mirage. There is but one safe road. If we would not end in disappointment the search to find out God, we must look to Christ. He still says to us today: "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father." J. A. M.

The Near and the Farther View

WEDNESDAY. John 12:21. "Sir, we would see Jesus." The point of view makes a vast difference in the scene. Standing near a copper plate in Washington, one may read in fine words, the Constitution of the United States. Stepping back a little, one beholds a polished portrait of the Father of his Country, who was the incarnation of the Constitution. Nearly two thousand years away from Jesus we read His divine words. Closing the Book, by faith we see the face of Christ and realize that He is the incarnation of Bible truth, the personality so much dearer than His written teachings.

Those who lived in Christ's time saw Him as the Babe of Bethlehem, the boy of the temple, the carpenter of Nazareth, the worker of miracles and, at last! Christ the Crucified, the risen Redeemer. These were different viewpoints in the life of the wonderful One. So it will be in the life everlasting. There will be new visions, according to the attitude and need of the individual viewer.

Standing near some great paintings, they appear meaningless, while at a proper distance, the masterpiece thrills one with its indescribable beauty. Too near the Alps, one beholds only the little foothills. When we were near Washington and Lincoln, how little we knew them! Today, the lofty summits of their characters are leading all races towards the heights of freedom. So with the Christ. Near to Him, we study with a critical eye, seeking for defects in His teaching, His miracles and parables. Looking through the telescope of faith, we behold Him as the Son of God, and commune with Him as the Saviour of mankind, in whose glorious Presence we are assured we shall dwell forever. E. W. C.

The Abiding Christ

THURSDAY. John 12:32. "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me." There are times when it is exceedingly difficult to be a Christian. There are other times when we do not find it hard to be true, whole-hearted, faithful and loyal. This, however, does not give us license to be less Christian. To the contrary, it is a challenge to our fidelity.

Near the writer's home is what is known as an "intermittent stream." According to nature's laws, this stream flows only for a little while and is dry the remainder of the year. It is the stream that flows continuously and constantly that serves humanity the best. It is the life that is consistent and unswerving in the realm of high ideals and lofty standards that serves humanity the best. Jesus said "And I, if I be lifted up." He did not say "When I am lifted up." The challenge of the Christian life is not one directed at our convenience but aimed at our consistency. It is a clarion not to our comfort but to our convictions.

Frequent revivals would be unnecessary were we more constant in our conduct, more earnest in our righteous endeavor, truer to our divine trust. Cora Harris tells of an electric sign used during a revival. At intervals of a second the sign bulletined the intelligence, "Jesus is Here," over the portals of the Church. When the special services were at an end the evangelist went to another field. He took his sign with him. Evidently, if we "believe in signs," Jesus was no longer there. But he was—He is everywhere, all of the time. The world shall never know this until we can say, every day, year in, year out, "Christ in me the hope of glory!" R. B.

The Lonely Christ

FRIDAY. Mark 15:24. "Jesus cried with a loud voice, My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken me?" Of all the sayings of Jesus on the Cross, this, the fourth, is the most sorrowful and the most incomprehensible. To be rejected by the world has been the lot of many. It was the lot of Columbus. To be deserted by friends has been a common experience, though generally there is at least one friend who remains faithful. But to be forsaken by the Father is life's bitterest cup. Job is an instance of supreme suffering, but he never felt that God had forsaken him. Jesus did. But Jesus all His life was lonely. Genius is ever lonely. Culture is lonely. Confucius complained, "There is none here that knows me, but there is heaven—heaven knows me." Great sorrow is lonely. Jesus sounded the depth of human suffering. He could not have been other than a lonely soul. But lonely souls may have fellowship with God. Jesus always had.

Always? Nay, that fellowship was interrupted. On the Cross He felt the Father's friendship withdrawn. Why was it so? In order that in all things He might be our Brother. No one of us can ever be as desolate as Christ felt on the Cross. An affectionate father has been known to discipline his child by denying him for a time the privilege of calling him father. Jesus needed no such discipline. But henceforth it is possible to say to one in unspeakable depression, "We may not know how lonely you are, but Jesus knows."

So, Jesus is fitted to be our Comforter. He was not suffering loneliness for Himself alone. He was not a mere martyr. His sense of having lost God was in order that we might know, when such thoughts come to us, that God is not lost, that He is never far away. The penalty of unforgiven sin is separation from God. Jesus was bearing this penalty for us. He bore reproach for us. Not until we have borne reproach for Him—felt loneliness for Him—shall we have perfect fellowship with the lonely Christ. C. C. A.

The Encouragement of "Good Cheer"

SATURDAY. John 16:33. "Be of good cheer." The above in the original text is a single Greek word and it is found only five times in the New Testament. One might have expected such advice to be often repeated; but unlike many who seek to impart courage to their fellows, our Lord does not depend upon exhortations. Some leaders are continually saying to themselves and to others, "Cheer up," thereby coddling drooping spirits to present the appearance of light-heartedness. Jesus used such words sparingly and then only in connection with His announcement of certain facts which ought to produce courage. He told a sick man to be of good cheer, adding "Thy sins are forgiven thee" as the ground of his hopefulness. To His disciples He said, "Be of good cheer"—not however expecting them to "make bricks without straws," to produce cheerfulness by magic; for, He added significantly, "I have overcome the world."

We only mock humanity when we indulge in cheap watch-words and slogans, as though despair could be driven away by the repetition of a gay phrase. Temporary relief is the only product of such superficial devices. The courage and cheer which Jesus Himself had He communicates by means of great truths which, when understood, produce such a state of mind. Think not to keep a brave heart by any other method. Many would-be optimists are building upon the sand, relying upon formulas, which have no power to sustain the human spirit. W. L. G.

Stewardship in China

The Work Thousands of Christian Herald Readers, by Their Contributions, Made Possible in the Famine Zone

By RAE D. HENKLE

IN THE early part of October last year, reports from its correspondents in China began to reach the Christian Herald, telling of an unusual drought over a large part of the five northern provinces, and the probability of a famine of unprecedented magnitude. Already at that time suffering in many districts was intense. Homes were being torn down, property was being sold or mortgaged, children were being disposed of, either by sale or death, and every indication pointed to a catastrophe, the like of which China had never seen.

Naturally the thoughts of the missionaries who were in closest touch with the situation turned first to the Christian Herald, for the reason that this magazine in other times of emergency had responded splendidly to appeals for aid. In 1901, 1907, and again in 1911, the Christian Herald readers had contributed hundreds of thousands of dollars to the relief of sufferers from flood, famines, and aided in the problems of reconstruction and orphan care that succeeded the famine periods. Most of the missionaries who were the distributors of Herald Funds, especially in 1911, were still in the field and retained vivid recollections of the help that had come from the great Christian Herald family in that time of terrible distress.

When the first appeals by mail and cable reached the office of the magazine last fall, a very serious problem arose. The world was still in a period of reconstruction following the World War. The demands on the charitable people of the United States had been incessant for the six preceding years. Hundreds of millions of dollars had been collected by various agencies for national and international relief. Two appeals were before the public at that very hour, one for Armenia and one for Central Europe, the two aggregating nearly fifty million dollars. There was abundant reason to doubt whether a new appeal, especially for far-off China, in which the average American had little or no personal interest, would have any chance of success.

Word from China, however, became more and more alarming. It seemed impossible to resist the plea for some assistance, and after consultation with the Department of State at Washington, the national headquarters of the American Red Cross and the Chinese Legation in Washington, it was decided to open the columns of the Christian Herald and through them tell the story of China's suffering for such response as the readers of the magazine might be inclined to make. An announcement to this effect was published in the number for November 27th.

EVEN before this issue was off the press, it became obvious that the situation in China would require the utmost effort of the American public, if even a small part of the coming horror was to be prevented. No single magazine or other individual agency, we believed, could hope to cope with it. It was decided that a truly national effort for relief should be made, and Mr. Patterson, the publisher of the Rev. Z. Charles Beals, of Wuku, who organized the Christian Herald Famine Relief Committee in China and served as its treasurer, is caught by the camera before a temple gate. Mrs. Beals is sitting in the Peking cart

Christian Herald, wrote to President Wilson, outlining conditions in China as they were explained by correspondents, emphasized the necessity of a national expression of American sympathy for a sister republic in distress, and suggested the advisability of the President naming a national committee to appeal to the country for relief funds. Conferences were held with the leaders of various foreign mission boards, and with men who were deeply interested in the welfare and development of China, and their support for the suggestion was obtained.

On December 9th President Wilson made public a proclamation to the American people, calling attention in earnest phrases to the famine, and beseeching contributions to a fund for its relief. At the same time he named some 130 of the most prominent men and women in the country as a committee to organize the appeal, and carry it to the country. Mr. Thomas W. Lamont, a member of the banking firm of J. P. Morgan & Company, and a very sincere friend of the Chinese people, was appointed chairman of the committee, the Honorable Norman H. Davis, then Acting Secretary of State was named Honorary Treasurer, Mr. Patterson of the Christian Herald was Vice-Chairman, and the writer, General Secretary, of the committee. Headquarters were established in the offices of the Christian Herald, and plans were immediately prepared for a country-wide appeal.

Before it became certain that a national committee would be possible, the Christian Herald had communicated with Reverend Z. Charles Beals, who had been treasurer of the 1911 Christian Herald China Famine Fund, asking him if he would undertake the formation of a Christian Herald committee in China for the administration of whatever funds were collected for relief purposes. Dr. Beals promptly responded with word that a committee was being organized under the chairmanship of Bishop W. C. White and Dr. Percy C. Leslie, with Rev. H. M. Harris as Secretary and himself as treasurer. Remittances of $30,000 gold were promptly made to him through the Department of State for the prompt inauguration of relief activities.

The experience of prior years in huge relief operations showed plainly the absolute need of centralized effort if the most satisfactory results were to be obtained. This necessity brought a new problem to the office of the Christian Herald in the merging of the magazine's appeal with that of the American Committee, and a merging at the same time of relief administration in China. Not only must the Christian Herald merge its activities, however, but it was decided that every attempt must be made to obtain complete co-operation between all the denominational agencies that had large interests in the famine districts, and that might be expected to assist in relief in the field. To this end the representatives of the leading denominations at the Foreign Missions Conference, held in Garden City, N. Y., in January, decided to appoint a church-co-operating committee to work with the American Committee, and such denominations as the Presbyterian, Baptist, Southern Methodist, Lutheran, etc., agreed in the interest of economy and efficiency to transmit through the American Committee all funds collected denominationally.

As soon as the American Committee assumed its duties, the Christian Herald Committee in China was informed of developments through Dr. Beals, who had at the same time received an additional $25,000 gold through the State Department, and he and the committee were asked to co-operate in every way possible with a general committee of representative American missionaries and business men to be organized in Peking, as representative of the national committee. Thereafter, all the funds contributed through the Christian Herald were placed in a general treasury with those of the co-operating denominations, and were disbursed under the authority of the American Advisory Committee in Peking, of which the Honorable Charles R. Crane, then United States Minister to China, was the chairman.

In the months between the date of the Christian Herald's first appeal, and June 9th, when word was received that the emergency in China had passed, the Christian Herald and the American Committee had been able to place at the disposal of famine relief agencies in China, directly and indirectly the huge sum of more than $7,500,000.

It is estimated that the Christian Herald contributions alone were sufficient to save in excess of two million lives.

While the auditors are still engaged in an examination of the accounts of the fund, preliminary figures show that this money was raised, and distributed in the famine district, at a cost of slightly less than 3 per cent., which we believe to be a most remarkable financial showing. In other words, this great sum of money was raised by appeals in every town and village in the United States, was received in New York, transmitted to China and put to work in the relief of suffering at a cost only a trifle more than that of a two-cent stamp to cover an official receipt for each dollar contributed.

While there has been no estimate of mortality in China as the result of the famine, owing to peculiar conditions prevailing locally and by lack of ordinary vital statistics, Chinese and American observers who were in closest possible contact with relief operations believe that at least ten million lives were saved by American money. In view of the fact

Big Christian Herald Charities

THE response of the Christian Herald family to the appeal for starving China was the most generous in the history of the magazine—a history made notable by many great relief undertakings. In the six months that elapsed between the opening of the fund and its official close on June 9, the Christian Herald readers contributed $563,314.35. Since June 9, an additional $2,797.88 has been received in unpaid contributors, making a total of $566,112.23. Other big Christian Herald relief funds follow:

that virtually all relief was administered by or through mission stations, it can be assumed that at least these ten million natives rescued from death came under direct, helpful, stimulating, Christian influence that will linger about them the remainder of their lives. Unquestionably the response of Christian America to the appeal for help has advanced the cause of the Church in China a full generation.

But not only has Christianity received a tremendous stimulus. The whole-hearted and generous manner in which the American people contributed to the relief has done more than any other single thing to weld China closer to the United States in friendship and loyalty. Her friend traditionally, China more than ever looks upon us as the one nation in the world to whom she can turn in times of trouble, certain of sympathy and understanding.

To the readers of the Christian Herald, a great part of the credit for this accomplishment must be given. It was you who made possible in the first place the first efforts toward relief, and it was your inspiration and enthusiasm in answering the appeal for help that inspired the rest of the country to step forward so magnificently.

Official Thanks from President of China

A NOTE from His Excellency W. W. Yen, Minister for Foreign Affairs, to Mr. A. B. Ruddock, American Charge d'Affaires, ad interim, in Peking, and transmitted by Mr. Ruddock to Hon. Charles E. Hughes, Secretary of State:

Sir—I have the honor to inform you that I received on the twenty-fourth instant a Mandate from His Excellency the President of the Republic recounting that during the famine period resulting from the drought prevalent in the northern provinces in the past year this nation has happily been able to rely upon united assistance in famine relief rendered by private persons of all classes, as well as upon the aid of the governments of all friendly nations. The result of these efforts has been that a million victims of the famine have been restored to life and to happiness. His Excellency the President has therefore issued a special Mandate expressing his sentiments of deep gratitude. This Mandate I now have the honor to transcribe and enclose for your information, Mr. Charge d'Affaires, with the request that you have the kindness to bring it to the knowledge of your Government.

(SEAL OF THE FOREIGN OFFICE.)

PRESIDENTIAL MANDATE

Issued by His Excellency, the President of the Chinese Republic, on June 24, 1921.

THE Famine conditions arising from the drought of the past year in the northern provinces have been of exceptional severity, and extreme difficulty has attended the extending of relief. The greatest reliance has been placed on persons of Chinese and foreign nationality and on Chinese citizens residing abroad, who have all, ignoring international boundaries, contributed relief funds to the fullest extent of their abilities. The fame of their humanity has been published abroad and it merits the highest praise. The governments of friendly nations have strengthened the bonds of international friendship by the manifestation of their zeal in collecting huge sums for relief and in saving enormous numbers of our famine-stricken citizens. Meditating on their acts of benevolence and their works of compassion we see their complete response to the claims of righteousness for the relief of distress and the manifestation of pity for a neighbor nation. The entire body of our fellow citizens is moved by a spirit of profound gratitude and of respect.

We have now come to the time when relief measures are at the point of imminent conclusion. The Ministry of the Interior is directed to act in co-operation with the high authorities of the affected provinces in the issuance of instructions to their various official subordinates to take joint measures with the literary and commercial classes of the regions concerned in making plans and attending to the measures that must follow the cessation of relief work. It is profoundly to be hoped that the people may be restored to the peaceful pursuit of their livelihood. Thus there will be fulfilled the benevolent intention of myself, the President, to compassionate and to protect the people of the nation.

Tear Down Their Idols

THE influence of relief work on the spread of the Gospel is well illustrated by the following extract from a letter from Rev. Henry S. Leitzel:

"What a responsibility God has put upon our church in this section! We are the only ones doing any large relief work here. In several villages where our men have gone, the village chiefs have gone with them, and when they talked to the people of Jesus Christ the chiefs have told the people to believe what the preachers told them and not to depend on their idols of mud and stone. In many cases those who have received help have torn down their paper household gods. If only we can enter and lead these people to see the true light! Their own gods are thoroughly discredited. We are going to bring them to our God, but how? We constantly pray for His strength and guidance.

"To those who have made this relief work possible, go the grateful thanks of all these thousands.

"Some of our other plans have had to be given up, but we believe the Lord is directing us and will bring what results He wills."

Wee T' Sigh

A Story of a Little Chinese Boy Who Found Shelter in the Shadow ### of the Foreign Devil's Church

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

JUST a little boy he was. Too little to understand why one could not have something to eat if one asked for it. Too little, even, to comprehend why one was allowed to cry because of a strange empty feeling in the center of one's small body. Always before he had been made much of—always before his slightest cries had been stilled with a bit of bread.

"He is the first-born," his young, pretty mother would croon, as she worked happily about the house. And—"The first-born!" his grandmother would echo proudly.

Even his tall father had petted him—had sometimes brought sticky sweets to him from the bazaar.

But that—as Wee T' Sigh reckoned time—had been long ago. It was many days since his mother had moved happily about the house, many days since she had moved at all! And his grandmother had been taken away in the night, when he was only half asleep—carried away, roughly, by strange men who wore spades slung across their shoulders. Wee T' Sigh had sobbed, drowsily, as they carried her off, but his father had comforted him. And his mother had later rocked him in her arms.

He had been entirely asleep when his mother left—so fast asleep that he did not feel the pang of her going. And in the sunlight of the next morning, when he called to her, it was his tall father who answered him, who again comforted him.

Wee T' Sigh missed his mother and his grandmother bitterly. But the situation did not become desperate until his father failed him. For one night his father did not come home. At dusk, as he waited patiently in the doorway, his baby cheeks smudged with the grime of dirt and tears, he heard two neighbors talking about it.

"So the father has passed on, also," said one of the neighbors, "and the child is left alone. If I had food—even one scrap of food—I would take him in!"

"Yes, the father has gone," the other neighbor said slowly, "the child need wait no longer for him. If death but comes to him quickly—as it did to his father—he will be better off. Our gods have surely turned to devils."

And they passed on.

Fearfully, only half understanding, little Wee T' Sigh looked back over his shoulder into the empty house. In the dim twilight they stared at him, eerily, the gods that had turned to devils! The Household God, upon his altar, was leering with a pitiless grimace; the kitchen gods and the gods of the ancestors were grinning. Of a sudden Wee T' Sigh wheeled and ran out into the street. And he called, wildly, as he ran. "Daddy," he called, "it is your first-born son! Come back to him . . . daddy!"

One of the Little Wee T' Sighs saved with Christian Herald money

Only a little boy he was. Too little to understand that his tall father was beyond the reach of a child's voice. Too little to understand why he was cold or hungry. Too little, even, to know why he was running away from the empty house with its grinning gods!

The streets were deserted and terrible. The houses, on either side of them, seemed shell-like and empty, too. Wee T' Sigh was tired, very tired. His small feet ached with running, his small, tired brain ached, too. And yet he did not stop—somehow he could not stop!

Just ahead of him stood a white house—a house with a gold cross on the top of it. The people of his neighborhood had called it the Foreign Devil's Church—his tall father had warned him against lingering near to it. But Wee T' Sigh was too weary to remember warnings. He hurried on, and as he hurried he saw a sudden glowing light spring up behind one of the windows of the house.

At the sight of the glow coming from behind the window, Wee T' Sigh stopped running. For there was a picture on the window—a strange God picture! It was the picture of a Man with long, bright hair holding little children in his arms; a picture made of bits of glass. And the light, shining through it, made the Man seem to smile. Wee T' Sigh knew that he should be afraid of it—for Gods were devils—but somehow he could not be afraid. He almost smiled—a wan baby's smile—as he crept near.

"Honorable Sir," he said, "God of the foreign devils, I am Wee T' Sigh—the first-born son of my daddy! You would not hurt me, would you? You are not like those others—" he was thinking of the Household God and the kitchen gods and the gods of the ancestors—"You would not hurt me."

He crept even closer—a very little boy who did not understand. And as he drew near to the stained-glass window his pinched little face began suddenly to reflect the glow that came from behind the window. It was as if some precious flower had come to life in his soul. He spoke again, softly, to the Foreign Devils' God-picture.

"Honorable Sir," he said, and his voice was very weak, "may I sleep at your feet? For I am lonely—I who am the first-born son of—"

All at once he collapsed in a little heap on the frozen ground; a pitiful little heap.

Inside the church the white devils' minister was reading a letter. It was from America.

"We hope," began the letter, "to send money to you, soon, for the stricken ones."

And you did!

REV. H. KERR TAYLOR, at Siaochang, Chihli province, in the midst of his relief work, wrote:

"The other thing is this—I wonder what God thinks; mission work stopped, hospitals and schools all necessarily closed to release valuable men for work, Sabbath day work imperative. I think I know He would have it so. We are trying to give something to eat to some of these little ones who are hungry. But what about this land of poverty and sin and unceasing living on the ragged edge?

"I think He would have me tell His story to just as many as I can, calling to Him just as many as I can now with an earnest desire that they, too, may share the joy with Him when He comes; and then, too, because He may not just yet come, to try to do all I can to make this place now like it will be when He comes."

M<sup>ISS</sup> PETERSON is the Mary Slessor of China. What has not this godly woman accomplished this past year? She has fed tens of thousands of men, women and children. They have camped all about her door and yard for months. She had many babies and small children sleeping in her bedroom all winter. Clean? Not that you would notice it, but ragged, dirty, and in many cases covered with vermin. How could she turn them out? They would freeze to death. How could she wash and clean them up? She had to buy the food and superintend the cooking of it for thousands daily. For days she could not take off her clothes, and could only catch a short nap of sleep between times, as these starving multitudes kept coming in all hours of the day and night, knocking at her door, crying for relief and to save life. The following is what she wrote me yesterday: "Praise God for these gifts from the Christian Herald! How thankful we are for these big gifts from them. It is God's way of helping us save these suffering ones. We are thankful to the Lord for sparing us from sickness and death. Typhus is here all around us, but we are safe."

This is an extract from a letter from Dr. Beals, treasurer of the Christian Herald fund. The Committee appropriated $2,500 of your money to help Miss Peterson with her work.

Foochow Homes Expanded

Large and Important Plans for Extension of Christian Herald Work in Fukien Province Are Nearing Completion

THE development of the Industrial Mission, while of comparatively recent date, has become one of the most important features of missionary activity. In all of the foreign mission fields, there has come to be a pretty complete realization of the fact that before the native can truly accept Christianity, his economic and social condition must be brought into harmony with the principles on which Christianity was founded, and he must be introduced to some of the phases of life that have resulted from the spread of the Christian faith.

India, heretofore, has been the most fertile field for the development of the Industrial Mission, due in large measure to the peculiar caste system which makes it almost necessary to devise some remunerative occupation for the convert, who loses caste on his conversion. The work has spread rapidly through South Africa, however, and a number of small but valuable experiments have been conducted in China in connection with the mission schools.

The Christian Herald first manifested a positive interest in industrial mission work with the organization, in 1910, as an outgrowth of the China Famine of 1907-1908, of the Christian Herald Fukien Industrial Homes of Foochow, where some 200 orphans were welcomed and received some industrial as well as scholastic training.

Boys at class work in the Christian Herald Fukien Homes, where Industrial Work will be much expanded engaged in. As a result of a series of conferences, an amendment to the articles of incorporation of the Christian Herald Fukien Industrial Homes has been prepared. In the amended charter, the name of the corporation will become hereafter, The Christian Herald Industrial Missions in China, Inc.

THE object briefly, will be to "establish, institute and operate missions under Christian influence for the purpose of enabling and assisting the indigent, unfortunate, delinquent or defective, the homeless, orphans, or any other needy persons to improve their condition and to support, or partially support, themselves by industrial training and work." The charter further authorizes the missions to build dormitories, homes and schools, plants, factories, experiment stations and laboratories, necessary to carry out the purpose of the mission; to acquire such plants and machinery necessary in connection with instruction in agriculture, woodworking, mining, cotton and silk spinning, and weaving, or such other industries as may be considered later; to provide a market for the product of the missions, to purchase and hold necessary property and to accept gifts for the support and maintenance of the missions.

The enlarged institution will be controlled by a board of nine trustees, representing the Christian Herald and such other interests as are directly concerned in the maintenance and development of the missions. This board will exercise only such general control as is necessary to maintain the character of the mission as a Christian institution, and fulfill the purposes for which it is established. The actual management will be in the hands of a board of directors with members particularly residing in the province of Fukien, where they will have direct contact with the work. This board will consist of both foreigners and Chinese, and there will be adequate safeguards to guarantee that the work will be permanently under Christian influences, and operated on the most approved Christian lines.

Plans are being tentatively prepared now for the establishment of a series of scholarships to be competed for by the children in mission schools in all parts of China. It is the present purpose to arrange for between one and two hundred of these scholarships, the winners to be chosen on the basis of general school attainments. With the appointment of these additional students, the enrollment of the schools at Foochow will be increased to approximately 400 children.

One of the first steps to be taken in the enlarged institution will be the dispatch to China of an American engineer who will have direct charge of the industrial work, and its organization along modern American lines. Included in the work planned is an ice-making plant, to be operated by the students, and the product disposed of for the support of the mission, and also iron-working and wood-working plants. Cotton and silk weaving, and some measure of wood-working are taught at present in the homes. At the same time the children now cared for are receiving what is equivalent to lower primary work in the American public school. For higher primary work those showing aptitude for advanced study have been sent to either mission or government boarding-schools, but under the new plans training of this type probably will be given in the Christian Herald Mission.

CHILDREN from the homes already have made their mark in Chinese political and business life during the last decade. They have left the confines of the Home, strong Christian characters, well equipped for their life-work and they are now among the most enthusiastic supporters of the institution. It is the confident expectation that the enlarged mission will provide a training school for Chinese which will result in the establishment of Chinese-supported industrial centers, in every part of the Republic. Boys will be brought to Foochow and in the course of years receive training, not only in academic, but in their chosen form of industrial, work under influences that are wholly Christian, and will go out to their home districts qualified not only as Christian leaders, but trained in some form of work that will aid in the modernizing and upbuilding of their home communities.

Although there is no intention of drawing on the American public for the entire support of the enlarged work, the Christian Herald is confident that its friends will want to have some part in the support of such an important undertaking. We want the salaries and expenses of the native superintendents and the American personnel to come from their friends in the United States, and we are confident that provision likewise will be made for a certain number of scholarships. Guarantees of support already have been received, however, from Chinese sources which will go far toward the cost of maintenance, and it is the expectation that the entire cost of this part of the

Christian Herald Orphanage Girls at American Board Mission School, Foochow

It has lent its influence to many other institutions of smaller character, and founded for work along this line the Christian Herald Orphanage in Jerusalem, for the care of and industrial training of child victims of the Great War in the Near East.

China now seems a particularly important territory for a larger development of industrial work under Christian auspices, and the Christian Herald is planning in co-operation with a number of its friends an enlargement of this venture in Fukien which should have a tremendous effect on the entire future of the Republic of China.

Miss Emily Hartwell of the American Board Missions in Foochow, who has been in general charge of the Christian Herald Homes in Fukien since their establishment in 1910, has been in the United States for the last few months, discussing with Mr. Patterson and the members of the Christian Herald staff the enlargement of the Homes, and a notable expansion in the type of work work will be borne by the Chinese themselves.

In other words, we are undertaking to lay a foundation for a Christian institution in China which will teach the Chinese how to help themselves.

In addition to the property now occupied by the Homes in the city of Foochow, and in its suburbs, property to be devoted to this purpose has been purchased this summer near the mouth of the Ming River, and other plots are being considered.

The project is just one more illustration of the ambition of the Christian Herald to impress the values of Christianity on a heathen people, and to aid in the dissemination of the Gospel in all backward quarters of the world. The Fukien institution should wield a tremendous influence on the future of China, and stand for generations as a monument to the desire of the American people to improve the condition of the Chinese people morally, socially and economically.

Testimony Through Dr. Beals

"IF YOU could see and hear all the pleas from missionaries for the Christian Herald Fund, it would bring you to tears," said Dr. Beals in one letter to us, "and if you could hear the shouts of praise and thanksgiving for monies received, you would feel that God had brought you to the Kingdom for such a time as this. One writes, 'What joy your help has given us. We can now save thousands of those around us who would certainly have died without it.' Another, 'What would we have done without your help? Hundreds of children are saved by it.' A lady writes, 'We are supplying thousands of destitute women and children with food by the money you sent us, but how shall we carry on if the Christian Herald money stops? All our work is lost, the people will die before harvest.' Another writes, 'What would we have done without the Christian Herald money? It was a God-send indeed.' A lady writes, 'We have just held a thanksgiving prayer meeting. I wish the givers could realize how glad we are to be the distributors. If their help stops, who will save these destitute ones?' There are many more on the same strain, but you can see how they realize that your Fund has saved the lives of numberless men, women and children which would not have been reached by others."

Thanks from the Field

REV. D. A. G. HARDING writes from his station: "Praise God for the Christian Herald gift. We did so need it for our starving Christians here. What a glorious thing to have such a Fund at such a time as this."

Others have written to Dr. Beals saying: "If this Christian Herald money had not been sent out tens of thousands of men, women and children would have perished. Funds from other sources came later. How these gifts have saved the situation. Praise the Lord!" "I thank you for the $2,000 Christian Herald money for the starving Christian and others in our Parish. Our Church people, Christians and Inquirers would have died but for this special help."

Opportunity of a Lifetime

"GOD has marvelously answered prayer in our behalf. After all, this is not our work but His. We are grateful that He has sent us into such a place of service. Surely it is the opportunity of a lifetime. And we are grateful that He has given us friends both in America and here in China who are so generously supplying us with funds for this work and are backing up their gifts of gold and silver with their prayers. We know that in some cases these gifts have meant real sacrifice."

Buying Relief Supplies

Impossibility of Economic Shipment of Food from America Compelled Committees to Purchase Cheap Grain in Far East

DURING the progress of relief operations in China, very serious efforts were made to arrange some system by which a surplus of foodstuffs in the United States could be utilized economically to feed the hungry on the other side of the world. Basing its suggestion on experience in other famines, the Christian Herald when it issued its first appeal for funds, indicated that it would receive donations of grain from American farmers for transportation to China. Almost immediately it became evident that policies effective ten years ago could not be revived and made to apply to conditions of today.

We were very soon in a position where grain was offered to us and shipping instructions were requested, and we were compelled to write apologetic notes informing the donors that it would be impossible for us to accept such gifts. The bare cost of shipping the grain from Middle Western centers to a Chinese port with all the attendant delay was far in excess of the cost of considerable grain in the Orient, and there could be no justification in the administration of relief funds for an expenditure of that kind.

After the formation of the American Committee, large amounts of corn were offered free for transportation to China. Congress was appealed to to provide free transportation up to the amount of $500,000 on corn to be contributed, but the regular session of Congress expired on March 4th before the Senate had reached a joint resolution already approved by the House, making such appropriation. Without the cost of trans-Pacific shipment defrayed by the government, or some special agency, transportation experts figure a bushel of corn at Kansas City or Omaha would cost delivered in China between two and three times the cost of grain purchased in the Far East and laid down at a relief station.

VIRTUALLY, all of the relief distributed in the famine district was in the form of millet, soy bean and wheat. A purchasing bureau was organized in Peking, and large supplies of grain was found in Manchuria convenient to the Chinese Northern Railway. Owing to political and economic disturbances in that region during the last year of the war and the year following, very little grain had been exported and huge amounts of it were stored along railway tracks in the open, and available for purchase and shipment into the hunger provinces.

While some correspondents who were not familiar with the situation sent letters to friends in the United States accusing the relief committee in China of dealing with Chinese and Japanese profiteers in the purchase of food, the fact remains that so carefully were purchases made that a large proportion of the thousands of tons bought in Manchuria and shipped down to Tientsin for distribution through the five affected provinces was bought and delivered at a cost of less than $10.00 a ton. The Chinese government railways were placed temporarily in the control of John Earl Baker, an American engineer, who was in charge of the American Red Cross road-building operations in Shantung, and a member of the American Advisory Committee. Practically all traffic with the exception of that for relief was suspended for months, and the government issued a mandate carrying all relief supplies free of charge. This, of course, assisted materially in keeping down the cost of distributing grain. In addition to carrying supplies free of charge all relief workers had free transportation when engaged in relief operations.

IN THE actual distribution of supplies, the machinery was simplicity itself. Base stations were organized on the same principle as base stations were organized by the army in France. These stations might serve to cover several thousand square miles of territory. Secondary stations in the district drew their supplies from the main base by rail. Actual relief stations were not often to be found on the three railways that penetrated the famine districts, but the relief workers obtained their supplies by cart, wheelbarrow or porter from secondary rail bases. There were many instances where porters and barrows wheelers had to tramp forty or fifty miles for grain and the same distance back to the distributing station. Since some of these stations kept alive as many as 15,000 people, some idea of the strain on the personnel can be imagined. The mere task of carrying overland in a two or three days' journey sufficient food to keep the thousands of hungry alive was no small task.

These stations were almost entirely in control of missionaries, who were recruited from all parts of China for the purpose. It was a wearing, nerve-racking work, for at many points a single American was in sole control for months, seeing no other white person, surrounded by suffering, and arbiter of life and death. His assistants he recruited from among the native Christians or among the more intelligent and dependable of the population, regardless of religion. He was always sure of the support of the local magistrate and other local officials, and this relieved him of a large amount of worry over the behavior of the population. Dozens of instances of heroism already have come to light, any of which would have received official recognition had they occurred in service during the World War.

Preventing Dread Epidemics

China for First Time in Her Famine History, Comes Through Without Terrible Mortality from Cholera and Typhus

DURING the first few weeks of the China famine, there was every indication that an epidemic of cholera, typhus and famine fever, would break out, and grow into one of the worst disasters in the history of the world. Conditions apparently were ripe for such a development. Refugees by the thousand were gathering in crude camps, burrowing in holes like rabbits, and existing without any of the sanitary provisions which even China has come to accept as necessary to health.

Almost every message that reached us warned particularly of cholera and typhus which were appearing with alarming regularity wherever small groups of refugees were gathered. The fact that no epidemic of consequence occurred and that the famine period passed with little more than normal mortality from illness speaks volumes for the success of the efforts put forward by physicians, nurses and sanitary engineers.

By the first of January five anti-typhus units were organized and in the field. Each unit consisting of a foreign physician, a native physician, a group of nurses both Chinese and foreign, and a score of native porters. Full equipment for combating typhus was carried, and a systematic campaign was undertaken in the refugee camps. The native press gave large space to propaganda written so simply that any Chinese could follow it, and in some cases speakers were sent out to aid in spreading the warning against disease, and methods of preventing it. Provision was made for a large number of other units which would also take the field in the event an epidemic of large size threatened. So carefully was the whole situation handled, however, that not a single outbreak occurred. There were isolated deaths from cholera and typhus, and in some remote villages the death list was large, but for the first time in the history of China, she passed through a famine period without a terrible mortality from disease.

American training largely was responsible for this, for most of the physicians both foreign and Chinese were American trained, and most of the nurses received their training in American conducted hospitals.

It is interesting to know, however, that the man who organized the great campaign against the plague was an Austrian prisoner of war, a Viennese physician who had been a prisoner of the Russians in Siberia and who was released under the Bolshevik régime. This physician had made his way to the Pacific coast from the interior of Siberia, where he had been used by the Russians ever since his capture in 1915, in fighting the persistent epidemics of typhus that affected the prison camps. On his arrival in Peking, he was recognized by the medical men there as the greatest authority in the Far East on typhus, and his services were immediately drafted for work in the famine field. The organization of the campaign and its direction were placed entirely in his hands and the organization achieved a remarkable success.

Charities That Circle the Globe

What Christian Herald Readers Have Done to Relieve Suffering and Spread the Gospel in Every Part of the World

By GEORGE H. SANDISON

CHRIStIAN Service" has been the motto of the Christian Herald from its foundation, forty-three years ago, up to the present time. It taught the principle that a Christian must be not only a hearer but also a doer of the Word. Once embarked on this career, the area of service gradually expanded, until in the course of a few years it had reached out over continents and seas. As we look back on these early beginnings, and witness the expansion until the whole globe was literally girdled, we reflect with amazement at the goodness of God in opening doors, in removing all difficulties, and in blessing the work and bringing happiness to the thousands who were engaged in it, and to whom it gradually became the most precious thing in their lives.

The beginnings of these efforts were extremely simple and limited in area. A winter of wide-spread unemployment and hardship in New York furnished the opportunity to do some kindly work for the hungry families. A food fund raised by the generous readers of the Christian Herald, and distributed in the basements of a number of city churches in the poorer districts of New York, was the means of averting starvation in some 1200 homes. When the need passed, a small unexpended balance was devoted to giving a summer outing to several hundred children of these same families, which did the poor little things so much good that the idea came to the editors, "Why not do this every summer?" The result was the foundation of the Children's Home at Mont-Lawn which has grown to be one of the permanent features of the paper, and where some 60,000 children have been received since it was first opened.

The first of the remarkable chain of world-wide charities which followed was the relief sent by the Christian Herald to Russia in 1891-1892. European papers brought news of wide-spread suffering in sixteen Russian provinces—a territory equal in extent to our Mississippi Valley. Millions were threatened with starvation. The S. S. Conemaugh, then loading at the port of New York for Riga, agreed to carry a limited shipment of food from the Christian Herald. An appeal was made to the readers and some 5,000 sacks of American flour were contributed and loaded on the Conemaugh.

After she had sailed, contributions flowed in until sufficient money was received to charter the S. S. Leo, which in a remarkably short time sailed, flying the Christian Herald pennant and carrying a large cargo of flour for the starving people. This was the first complete cargo, and it was welcomed with great acclaim in Russia, and handsomely acknowledged by that government.

This map graphically shows the extent of the charities of the Christian Herald Family

THE next effort of the Christian Herald world charities was devoted to Armenia, 1894-1895. That unhappy land had been devastated by Kurds and the people were in a pitiable condition. Dr. Grace M. Kimball, American missionary physician in Van, sounded the call for help, cabling to the Christian Herald, which responded quickly by sending $10,000 which reached Armenia on Thanksgiving Day. This relief movement spread, and some sixteen supply stations were opened in different parts of the suffering territory, saving a multitude of lives and bringing a host of grateful acknowledgments from the missionaries on behalf of the people.

India was the next applicant for Christian Herald help. In 1897-1898 she was in the grasp of famine. Liberal contributions poured in from Christian Herald readers in response to her need and after a few remittances, it was decided to charter a steamer. The S. S. City of Everett was loaded with grain and sailed from San Francisco in 1898, in charge of Christian Herald representatives. This was the first of a chain of cargoes, showing the magnificent and tireless generosity of the Christian Herald readers, and was the means of saving thousands of lives, as many missionaries in India attested in their letters. Unfortunately the land has been repeatedly visited by crop failures, resulting in famine, and in later years the S. S. Quito was sent with a cargo of Christian Herald corn, valued at $300,000 in Bombay on its arrival. The charter of the steamer was generously paid by the United States Government, as many similar charters were granted under like conditions afterward, notably in the case of the great famine in China in the years 1901-1906, when the U. S. Transports Buford and Logan were detailed to carry to Shanghai food supplies for sufferers.

One of the saddest legacies of the India famine was the thousands of orphans who were left helpless, and in behalf of whom a large number of missionaries united in an appeal to the Christian Herald. It touched many American hearts, and the response was something so gratifying that we were soon enabled to raise sufficient funds to supply the needs of 5,000 orphans in Christian missionary care. One of the gladdest days in the India missionary field was that on which the news came that the Christian Herald readers had assumed the care of this great body of orphan children—the largest undertaking of its kind in the records of Christian philanthropy.

INDIA, however, was not the only land in which children were the basis of appeals which touched American sympathies so deeply. Japan, after a great famine in the northeast provinces, which the Christian Herald also helped to relieve, had its aftermath of orphans, and these, numbering many hundreds, were supported by our readers in two orphanages—one at Sendai and the other at Okayama. Like those in India, these orphanages were kept up and contributions continued until, the children having grown to manhood and womanhood, the need passed.

This work among famine orphans has had probably a greater spiritual effect than most people imagine. Many of the children became, in later years, missionaries, teachers, native pastors, Bible women, etc.

In the recent great famine in China—the worst ever experienced in that country—the gifts of the Christian Herald Family stirred other nations to emulate their example. It was the sowing of seed that bore fruit in a world-wide harvest.

One of the most picturesque charities of the Christian Herald was that in which we helped the sufferers after the disastrous eruption of Vesuvius, which ruined a number of Italian villages, destroyed many lives, and rendered thousands homeless. The Christian Herald was represented in the first cargo of food sent into Italy at that time, and afterwards its "Mothers' and Babies'

Fund"—which had been kept up during the entire summer and of which the Queen herself was the Patroness, was instrumental in saving the lives of many little ones.

But the Christian Herald charities were even more far-reaching than those already described. They stretched literally around the globe and included Finland, Lapland and Sweden, which we helped in the widespread famine of 1903, besides missionary work at different times in Palestine, Arabia, Persia, Turkey, Tibet, Korea, various lands in South America, and even Arctic Labrador. Cuba, during the period preceding our war with Spain, was the center of one of our most successful relief enterprises, when Clara Barton and Dr. Klopsch, through the generous gifts of our readers, were enabled to save the lives of thousands of starving reconcentrados.

Dr. Wilfrid Grenfell's noble work in Labrador, and the work of the Moravian Mission at Nain, have both been aided from year to year by the Christian Herald. Dipping southward across the equator, we can point to many places in the Malay Peninsula and even the South Sea Islands where missions have been helped and strengthened and encouraged by Christian Herald support. The world circle would not be complete without mention of the Missions on the northwestern side of the American continent, which have also been materially aided from time to time by the Christian Herald.

It must not be thought that in these far-flung philanthropies, "in His name," the needy in our own land were overlooked. The Bowery Mission, with its Bread-Line, has been kept busy for nearly thirty years; many of the Rescue Missions throughout the country have been materially helped, also refuges for women, including especially "The Door of Hope," founded by Mrs. Whittemore; also various labor institutions including the Colony at Surinam, Dutch Guiana, the Leper Mission in Jerusalem, and others, have been many times recipients of needed help. Orphanages for whites and blacks in the United States, Sunshine Homes, Rescue Missions, Industrial Institutions and similar charities are still being helped in times of need. Few in the West have ever forgotten the train-loads of clothing and provisions which Christian Herald readers sent to the distressed farmers of three Western States (Colorado, Dakota, and Nebraska) in the winter of 1895, after a succession of crop failures.

The list of domestic benevolences has increased, but these will suffice to show that our readers have generously striven to keep their own gardens tilled and fruitful, even while they were reaching to the ends of the world to help others.

38,000 Donors to the Fund

Records Show That Average Contribution Through the Christian Herald Was $15.02

WHEN the Christian Herald opened its China Famine Fund, it was the intention to publish the names of contributors each week as had been customary in other years. The responses were so surprisingly large in number, however, that it was quickly determined this method of acknowledgment would not be practicable. Entirely too much space would be required for the purpose, and the contents of the weekly issue would be contracted beyond reason.

When we announced that no further contributions would be acknowledged through the columns of the magazine, we said that in all probability public acknowledgment would be made in the form of a booklet to be issued at the end of the famine, giving a report of relief operations, together with the names of donors. In considering the question within the last few weeks, it seemed to us that the whole matter of Christian Herald participation in the relief work in China was of such importance that it could not help being of direct personal interest to every reader of the magazine. A booklet report would have been placed in the hands of contributors only. By devoting a section of the magazine to the fund, on the other hand, every reader, whether he made a contribution to the cause or not, will find a story of surpassing interest in what his own magazine family has accomplished.

Of course, every contributor immediately on the receipt of his contribution received a formal acknowledgment by mail. A large number of friends sent their checks with the distinct understanding that their names were not to appear in any report, or to receive publicity of any character. We have attempted faithfully to observe these conditions, but if you made a donation to the fund without a request for secrecy in connection with it, we would be glad to have you advise us if your name does not appear in this list.

In arranging this list of contributors, only two divisions were made. First by States and second alphabetically and by the amount of the contribution. We purposely omitted the local address for reasons that probably are obvious. The names and addresses of persons who are known to contribute to charitable or other purposes, are valuable assets in the hands of a certain type of solicitor.

To find your name, look for your state and then run down the column alphabetically.

The list of donors represented in this issue comprises a few less than 38,000, the largest number of individuals contributing to a charity in the history of the Christian Herald. The average donation was $15.02.

We believe this number of the Christian Herald will be unique enough to justify you in preserving it as a souvenir of one of the greatest relief operations ever undertaken by the American people.

Preventing Future Famines

Some of the Measures Under Consideration for Conserving Life and Property in the Fertile Valleys of China

PERMANENT famine prevention measures are being studied by the American Committee for China Famine Fund and its Advisory Committee in Peking, with the possibility that work along that line will be undertaken in the next few months.

While preventive activities have been in progress for several years either under the direction of the Chinese government or the American Red Cross little progress has been made in actual construction work due to lack of sufficient funds. Much of China's famine troubles, of course, have come from floods, whereas the 1920-21 famine was the result of two years of drought following a flood season:

From the earliest period in China's history levees or dikes have been employed to keep within bounds the rivers subject to annual flooding, owing to denudation of the hills in which they rise, and to the concentration of the rainfall within the summer months.

These dikes have often been placed so close to the winter channel that the space between them is barely sufficient in time of flood. Moreover, the advantage of laying them out in smooth curves has not been appreciated, and great difficulty is encountered in protecting the dikes when the current cuts a loop toward them.

But if you question the engineering skill of the Chinese, consider first the enormous amount of energy, expense and co-ordination required to build and maintain a system of dikes which, taken together, probably exceeds in bulk all the railway embankments in the world. Consider also that these "practical works" have been developed without the aid of the appliances and methods developed through the applications of modern science in the West.

AS a result of the Huai floods in 1911, the American Red Cross engaged C. D. Jameson to make a preliminary reconnaissance. He reported that it would be entirely feasible to give this region permanent relief, and at a cost of about $35,000,000 Chinese currency in about seven years to eliminate all but abnormal floods over an area of some 17,000 square miles; and by drainage to lower the flood level so that in all but abnormal years two crops each year could be raised in place of the prevailing average of two crops in five years.

Even before the Red Cross followed up Mr. Jameson's work by the appointment of a second commission, His Excellency Chang Chien, the great industrial leader of Kiangsu Province, organized a corps of assistants known as the Kiang-Huai Engineers; and for nine years they have been continuously making surveys and measurements of river discharge as a basis for thorough study and design, and have worked out a tentative plan for flood channels, dams and sluiceways, the whole to cost $90,000,000. Constructive criticism of these plans by Chinese and foreign engineers has been invited.

The recent great famine in the five northern provinces has very deeply impressed the Chinese officials with the need to push work for the control of the flood waters; and also for the reforestation of the bare hills in order to put an end not only to the floods but to the droughts that have claimed and are claiming so many victims.

Although it is often said that the Chinese build but do not repair, it surely can not be said they are altogether unmindful of the problems of water control.

ENGINEERING skill of a high order is shown in the great sea wall which keeps the tidal bore of Hangchow Bay from devastating the land. The tide here comes in twice a day, not gradually, but as a wall of water ten to thirty feet high with a speed of ten to twenty miles an hour, according to the tidal season and the direction of the wind.

It is estimated that at Haining a million and a half tons of water pass per minute in an average bore; and since the rush of water lasts the better part of an hour, you can imagine how difficult it must have been to build a wall to keep this "monster" out. The wall is thirty feet high, composed of granite blocks linked together with iron wedges and protected with three wide footings or ledges of stone reinforced with several rows of piles.

While giving a complete statement of cost of upkeep of this wall, which was built about 900 A. D., the historian refrains from telling how the feat of constructing it was actually accomplished, but simply notes that on an appointed day 5,000 archers stood on the bank, each with five arrows which, at a given signal, were shot into five successive crests of the oncoming flood and that thereupon the dragons turned and fled and the waters were stayed until bamboo creels filled with stone were put in place to form the initial bulwark.

The Oldest Newspaper in the World Was Published in the T'ang Dynasty, as a Report of the Events in the Court

There is no record to the effect that

Emperor Tai-Tsung reigned during the T'ang dynasty, which, although marked

In this same Tang period the oldest newspaper in the world was founded. It was intended primarily to publish the edicts of the emperor and was called Gazette of the Court. Some two centuries later, according to William Griffis, formerly of the Imperial University of Tokyo, the Chinese invented the art of printing with wooden blocks.

Any country or any individual that is judged by limitations rather than by achievements, is bound to be misunderstood. Outside nations lay stress on China's illiterate masses, and make small mention of her great scholars or of her rulers who furthered every educational and artistic cause.

How Americans Direct the Chinese

A College Professor of Languages Is Drafted to Build Dikes and Does the Job Successfully

By GEORGE H. DANTON

IT WAS no job for a teacher, mending Chinese dikes; but they sent our college a hurry call for help and so the two of us—both teachers of languages!—had to go.

The crops having been destroyed, the people were eating willow leaves and grass, and such millet as they had saved from their seed. One woman, a picture of utter misery, told me that she was waiting until she had sold her third child to commit suicide. She had sold her son for fifty coppers, her daughter for a bushel of wheat, and was now looking for a buyer for the third infant.

Yet that disaster of 1917 was a small matter compared with the recent famine, which covered not only the district then flooded but also an area some twenty times as large.

Though the details of the task were different, the relief work undertaken then gives a fair picture of the way Americans took hold last winter—the way they organize and direct the native energy.

The district in which the relief work was done was a part of the vast flooded area, about as large as the State of Maryland and with a population of some two million people. When my companion and I started on our work, relief in the form of food and seed distribution had been carried out with Red Cross money. Refugee camps had been established and a program of road building had been carried out to assist the flood sufferers. But the devastated district was still at the mercy of the oncoming summer rains, for the dikes had not been repaired and the rivers were likely to rise at any time. The matter was of the utmost urgency; prompt reclamation work would save millions of dollars of property.

It was a desolated sight which met our eyes in the flooded district. The mud villages had almost all of them dissolved in the rains and the people were too poor to build them up. In fact, many of them were afraid to do so because of the uncertain character of the stream beds in the district. In one village a river which had been ten miles away in previous years suddenly altered its course and made a new bed right through the center of the village, destroying houses, rendering land useless and complicating the question of land titles to an unbelievable degree.

GEORGE H. DANTON, since many years a resident of China, is a Professor in the Boxer Indemnity College at Peking. This is the institution built out of the indemnity funds given back to China by the United States, and is a monument of the friendship of the two republics. His description of his work in 1917 is illustrative of work in progress now as a result of a Yellow River flood in Shantung late in August.

In some parts of the district excellent agricultural land was covered with three feet of fine white sand; in others as far as the eye could reach with a small telescope there was a vast expanse of water.

Three-quarters of the villages in the district were more or less submerged. In the Wun Au district a vast lake had been formed which, a year after the floods, was still in some places seven feet deep.

A relief worker who had seen the Kurds sack the Armenian city of Van and who knew the devastation wrought in that section and was not one to exaggerate, told the writer that were it not for the war in Europe this flood in the province of Chihli would be regarded by the civilized world as one of the great calamities of history.

It is no slight task for a person who knows not one thing about engineering to dam a river four feet deep and fifty feet wide and to return it to its original course, and yet this was one of the tasks which confronted us and which we at last managed to accomplish. Educated Chinese are as competent as any foreigner, and they are prominent in directing famine relief. But the helplessness of the poor natives at such a time is startling, indeed high well incredible, to an American; getting competent help from them was the great difficulty.

MY COLLEAGUE had to find some one who knew how to construct a temporary dam across the river. The person whom he finally selected wasted some weeks in fruitless efforts and finally one day, standing up to his armpits in water with his surrounding coolies looking on agape, burst into tears and said, "I never knew how to do this and I never did it before." He gave up, and my colleague was compelled to buckle down to the actual construction work himself.

I was called from one part of the work to another to help out in superintending the repair of some fifteen miles of dikes. We spent our time riding up and down on horseback and seeing that the work was actually done. On this section there were some 3,000 men at work. They got up at daybreak, worked till eleven, rested till four, and worked till dark. Cheerful, ignorant, and practically all of them stark naked, they had for food two bowls of millet porridge a day, boiled up with a few bits of vegetables.

We worked out a method of levying upon the labor of the village. The dikes were staked off in lengths of 10 feet. Each dike was 30 feet wide at the bottom, 25 feet wide at the top and 15 feet high. The mass between each stake was the responsibility of one group of ten families, for which there was a local term "bay," and which seemed to be well recognized as a unit of division of labor. The workers provided their own tools and the village group was responsible for collecting the rollers or the pounders with which the earth was tamped to the necessary firmness.

Once or twice we had to call the village magistrate to put a ball and chain on a refractory worker, and in one flagrant case I did not interfere when the district magistrate gave a thorough beating to a case-hardened slacker.

There is a story told of some reconstruction work undertaken under foreign supervision in China, during the course of which a dam suddenly gave way and the flooding waters threatened to destroy considerable property. The German engineers immediately sat down to figure out the cause of the break, and the best remedy, and in a day or so had calculated with mathematical nicety the whole arrangement. The American engineers, as soon as they saw the rushing waters, seized a couple of shovels, filled the break and saved the property from destruction. This story illustrates the rough and ready willingness on the part of the average American to turn his hand to the job immediately before him. There was something of this spirit that came over American relief workers that year.

Federal Farm Loan Bonds

Safe Tax-Exempt Rate 5%

AT SOME TIME, during the year, every Christian Herald reader has money to invest. Glittering promises of high yields should not lure the careful investor from the beaten path of safety. The experience of generations has proved the safety of well-selected bonds and first mortgages. Federal Farm Loan Bonds combine the best features of both.

The Federal Farm Loan System is a National cooperative mortgage loan agency from which farmers who need more capital can secure money on long-time loans, at an interest rate they can afford to pay. It provides a safe, tax-free investment to those seeking the best form of security. This system is under Governmental supervision.

Federal Farm Loan Bonds are national in their purpose—to provide funds for a greater agricultural development. A prosperous agriculture will stabilize the prosperity of the entire country. Agriculture is our basic industry—every person is directly interested in the success and welfare of the farmer.

Both Principal and Interest Are Tax-free

Federal Farm Loan Bonds are safe—they are instrumentalities of the Government of the United States—so declared by law. These Bonds, issued by Federal Land Banks, are secured by massed first mortgages on productive farms, titled by their owners, and these mortgages can never in any case exceed 50% of the value of the farms. Further, they are guaranteed by all of the 12 Federal Land Banks with a combined capital of $25,000,000.

Federal Farm Loan Bonds pay 5% interest per annum, payable twice a year. These Bonds are exempt from taxation, likewise the income. They are quickly convertible into cash, and are A-1 security for bank loans to merchants, millers, manufacturers, farmers and others. To those having close business relations with the agricultural industry these Bonds should make an especially strong appeal.

The U. S. Treasury accepts Federal Farm Loan Bonds as security for Government deposits, including Postal Savings Funds. They are lawful investment for fiduciary and trust funds under the jurisdiction of the United States Government, and, under the laws of most States, for all public and private funds, including those of Savings Banks. No higher endorsement could be given.

Federal Farm Loan Bonds require no watching—they are safe, care-free and tax-exempt. There is no better investment for the small investor or the millionaire. Buy Federal Farm Loan Bonds and buy them now.
